

HAL
open science

Temporary Economic Migration and Rights Activism - an organisational perspective

Nicola Piper

► To cite this version:

Nicola Piper. Temporary Economic Migration and Rights Activism - an organisational perspective. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 2010, 33 (1), pp.108-125. 10.1080/01419870903023884 . hal-00599888

HAL Id: hal-00599888

<https://hal.science/hal-00599888>

Submitted on 11 Jun 2011

HAL is a multi-disciplinary open access archive for the deposit and dissemination of scientific research documents, whether they are published or not. The documents may come from teaching and research institutions in France or abroad, or from public or private research centers.

L'archive ouverte pluridisciplinaire HAL, est destinée au dépôt et à la diffusion de documents scientifiques de niveau recherche, publiés ou non, émanant des établissements d'enseignement et de recherche français ou étrangers, des laboratoires publics ou privés.

Temporary Economic Migration and Rights Activism - an organisational perspective

Journal:	Ethnic and Racial Studies
Manuscript ID:	RERS-2008-0156.R1
Manuscript Type:	Special Issue
Keywords:	temporary migration, Activism, Transnational, networks, organisations, transinstitutional

Temporary Economic Migration and Rights Activism – an organisational perspective

Abstract

Temporary contract migration schemes have experienced a revival in Europe. Such schemes mean that a significant number of migrant workers have limited access to rights and entitlements, let alone full citizenship. The temporary nature of their migration poses obstacles to traditional ways of organising workers. This changing landscape of migration dynamics, thus, requires a changing landscape of migrant rights activism also.

The focus in this paper is on collective activism by social justice organisations and their engagement with, and handling of, the subject matter of migrant workers' rights. Based on insights from scholars working on social movements and transnational advocacy networks, I argue that a trans-national and trans-institutional perspective is required in addressing temporary migrants' socio-economic and legal insecurities, and it is the concept of the 'network' which captures best these interactions between multiple actors at multiple sites.

Key words: temporary migration, rights activism, organisations, networking, transnational, trans-institutional

Introduction

Temporary contract migration poses a particular challenge for political activism on behalf of and by migrant workers. Policies of temporary or seasonal admission schemes which involve rising numbers of migrants have experienced a recent revival in Europe and North America, new birth in Australia and persistent continuity in Asia¹. Although temporary migrants are comprised of highly skilled and lower skilled

1
2
3 workers, the latter constitute the numerical majority. This means that there are a 4
5 substantial number of foreign workers with increasingly limited access to traditional 6
7 rights and entitlements, let alone full citizenship (Wickramasekara 2008). This is 8
9 likely to have implications for rights activism by civil society organisations involved 10 11 in campaigning for greater social and economic justice in general and of migrants in 12
13 specific (Grugel and Piper 2007; Piper 2008a). In fact, based on the insecure and 14
15 temporary nature of migration, the type of rights prioritised by migrants and the 16
17 organisations representing them tend to revolve around specific human rights, that is 18
19 labour rights, rather than conventional citizenship rights.
20
21
22
23
24
25

26
27 As indicated in the phrase 'rights activism', instead of providing a legalistic or 28
29 normative discussion of 'rights', I shift the focus to the role of collective organisations 30
31 in promoting a rights agenda and their way of operating in the attempt to influence 32
33 policy making. In the realm of work, the labour movement through trade unions and 34
35 relevant non-governmental organisations (NGOs) constitutes an important vehicle for 36
37 the representation of workers' interests. The main problem for foreign workers, 38
39 however, has been their status as non-citizens. Given trade unions' historical anti-40
41 immigration stance based on their focus on the national or indigenous workforce (see 42
43 e.g. Briggs 2001), migrants have often been excluded from membership and collective 44
45 political struggle until they firmly settle into the 'new' society and/or dominate certain 46
47 sectors of the labour market. The feminisation of migration and women's position in 48
49 mainly informal sector jobs is another area that trade unions have historically 50
51 neglected or struggled with (Piper 2008b). Moreover, in the light of changing 52
53 migration reality, with the revival or expansion of temporary contract schemes, 54
55 conventional trade union practices do not work for many economic migrants. As a 56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 result, NGOs and other civil society organisations have been filling the gap as service
4 providers and advocates (Ford 2006; Piper and Ford 2006). More recently, trade 5 unions have also begun to turn around and now actively support the inclusion and 6 rights of all migrants.
7
8
9
10 11

12
13
14
15 The focus in this paper is on collective activism via organisations and their 16 engagement with, and handling of, the subject matter of migrant workers' rights in the 17 context of temporary migration schemes. The changing landscape of migration
18 patterns, characterised by greater fluidity and complexity, requires a changing 19 landscape of migrant rights activism also. I therefore argue that a trans-national and 20 trans-institutional perspective is required in addressing migrants' socio-economic and 21 legal insecurities – theoretically as well as on the operational, that is to mean here:
22 organisational, level.
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33

34
35
36 My discussion will be based on an analytical framework which bridges sociological 37 literature on social movements and networks with works from within migration 38 studies on political mobilisation of migrants and transnationalism at the meso level of 39 organisations that defend migrant rights. I argue that a focus on networks captures 40 best the transnational as well as trans-institutional activities that are beginning to 41 emerge and are necessary to defend the rights of temporary migrants. The examples
42 given draw mainly on the European context with some reference made to the situation 43 in Asia also.
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Temporary Migration and Challenges to Political Activism

1
2
3
4
5
6 Temporary contract migration has become a significant phenomenon in many parts of 7
8 this world, having experienced a revival in Europe after the official 'zero migration'
9 10 policies following the early 1970s, a new birth in traditional settler countries such as 11
12 North America and Australia, and continuation in Asia (including the Gulf countries).
13
14 In this regard, the (re-)emergence of temporary and seasonal migration can arguably 15
16 be described as a converging policy of almost global outreach.
17
18 19 20
21

22 Both the volume and patterns of economic migration have undergone important 23
24 changes during the last decade. In Europe and elsewhere, demographic, economic and 25
26 labour-market related trends have resulted in the increased demand for skilled 27
28 foreigners (e.g. in the health and care sector) and the revival or intensification of 29
30 temporary ('guest worker') migration schemes (Ruhs 2006; Castles 2006; Piper 31
32 2008c). According to the International Labour Organisation (ILO), Europe constitutes 33
34 the region with the largest volume of migrant workers (27.5 million or 34%), 35
36 followed by Asia with 22.1 million or 27% foreign labour (ILO 2004:7). Asia 37
38 contrasts with Europe and traditional immigration countries in that governments of 39
40 destination countries in Asia practice temporary migration schemes only (with few 41
42 exceptions) and, thus, at least officially prevent migrants (especially those classified
43
44 as lower skilled) from settling and reuniting with their families in the host country².
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52

53 Since the 1990s Europe, and the UK in particular, has begun to re-open channels for 54
55 economic migration in 'new' sectors that attract, or are in need of, migrant workers.
56
57 This is now taking place as part of the policy discourse of 'managed migration' which 58
59 puts the emphasis on control issues rather than rights protection (Grugel and Piper 60

1
2
3 2007). The more or less systematic recruitment along skilled-lower skilled categories
4 entails an increasing bifurcation between these two categories in the ease of migration
5 between countries and accessing labour markets as well as other resources. A recent 6 report by the Trade Union Congress (TUC) in the UK has found that migrant workers
7 tend to be at either end of the spectrum: in professional work or what they refer to as 8 'routine jobs' and, thus, to a lesser extent in intermediate jobs (TUC 2007)³. The 9 increasing bifurcation between skilled and less skilled migration is part of the 10 promotion of 'knowledge economies', a concept that has been transposed into 11 migration policies by differentiating between bearers of distinct forms of human 12 capital (Kofman 2007).
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28

29 The trend towards greater diversification of migration categories and flows has also 30 become part of the traditional 'settler' countries' experience where migration has 31 become less permanent. There are more temporary migrants today than before, and in 32 addition, there is also more out-migration of 'native' citizens from these 'settler'
33 countries, as work on the Australian expatriates, for instance, has shown (Hugo et al.
34 2003). Diversification also plays out geographically: recent studies on newly arrived 35 migrants in the UK have shown that the preponderance to concentrate in the 36 South/Southeast of England is less noticeable today than in the 1990s (TUC 2007)
37 and more migrants now reside and work in smaller towns and rural counties all over 38 the UK, including Wales (e.g. Drinkwater and Blackaby 2004). The landscape of 39 migration has become more diverse in Europe as the result of EU enlargement also. In 40 the latter case, it is to date unclear whether newly arrived migrants from Eastern 41 Europe constitute part of a trend or a short-term phenomenon (TUC 2007).
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 At the lower skilled end, many of these migrants end up working in a narrow range of 4 sectors, especially in agriculture, construction and food packaging/processing as well
5
6 documented in the case of the UK (Markova and Black 2007; TLWG 2007; TUC
7
8 2007). Domestic work has proven to be an increasingly important 'sector' in Europe, 9
10 Asia, and North America and, thus, constitutes a vital employment opportunity for 11
12 newly arrived women. Migrant workers' location within specific sectors of the 13
14 (formal or informal) labour market and the temporary nature of their migration status 15
16 usually entail certain legal and economic constraints. This is likely to have 17
18 implications for migrant rights' advocacy work by civil society organisations and 19 20 political mobilisation of migrants.
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31

32 Temporary Migrants and concomitant rights issues

33
34 Lower skilled temporary migrant workers, who form the numerical majority of 35
36 economic migrants in Europe and Asia, are more vulnerable to rights violations as 37
38 opposed to the skilled, largely based on the specific position they occupy within 39
40 labour markets. They are highly represented in the informal sectors which are not 41
42 unionised, or in sectors where labour standards are often not applied (or do not even 43
44 exist, as in much of Asia). This affects local workers also and is often the reason why 45
46 they shun these jobs.
47
48
49
50
51
52

53 The key issues and concerns for temporary foreign workers which centre upon 54
55 workplace grievances can be broadly classified under two headings: 1) employment 56
57 related, and 2) welfare, occupational health and safety issues. Employment-related 58
59 issues are mainly about non-payment or under-payment of wages and unauthorised 60

1
2
3 deductions. Issues to do with welfare, occupational health and safety are concerns
4
5 pertaining to accommodation, long working hours and workplace hazards (ICFTU-
6
7 APRO 2003; TLWG 2007; TUC 2007). The latter includes work-related injuries and 8
9 accidents as well as physical/sexual abuse (as encountered by foreign domestic 10
11 workers, or FDWs). Official statistics on numbers and types of the various workplace 12
13 grievances are rare and mostly non-existent, and so are systematic studies or 14
15 recording activities by NGOs. The higher skilled migrants are often subject to de-16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

According to a multi-country study on Asia (Verité 2005) which covers Vietnam, Indonesia, the Philippines Thailand, Taiwan, Jordan and Malaysia, the list of common abuses against foreign contract labourers were excessive overtime, improper wage payments and withholding of wages. Despite the widespread existence of legislation limiting fees for service, placement or recruitment, fees charged were nevertheless excessive in practice in two regards: they exceed legal limits and often accounted for a large portion of a worker's earnings. This discrepancy between law and actual practice has to do with the absence of formal legal mechanisms for governing the payment of placement fees (with the exception of Vietnam). The report, therefore, concludes that the level of indebtedness of foreign contract workers pertains to 'debt-bondage' consistent with the United Nations (UN) definition of human trafficking.

A recent study in the UK has pointed to fairly similar problems categorised into two groups: 1. critical non-compliances and 2. major non-compliances. Under the first, failure to pay the minimum wage appears as fairly widespread and so is the overcharging of weekly payments for accommodation as well as the lack of

1
2
3 appropriate, safe and not overcrowded housing. The second category includes,
4
5 amongst other, deductions from salary without written consent and the non-issuing (or 6
7 incomplete issuing) of contracts (TLWG 2007).
8
9

10
11
12 With domestic work being a highly significant source of legal employment for foreign 13
14 women and the continuing demand for such services, it deserves special mention.

15
16 Legal status (work permit) does not automatically mean coverage by labour standards 17
18 laws. In fact, domestic work is widely excluded from national labour legislation 19
20 around the globe⁴. Foreign domestic workers or carers (typically women) do 21
22 commonly not fall under national employment acts whereas foreign workers in 23
24 industries such as construction and manufacturing are usually covered by industrial 25
26 relations legislation (Piper 2005b).
27
28
29
30
31
32
33

34 With regard to employment or labour rights of temporary workers, of grave concerns 35
36 for rights activists are breach of contract and the non- or under-payment of wages.

37
38 The notion of 'portable justice' captures the problem when contracted or 39
40 undocumented migrants are sent back 'home' or deported without being paid their 41
42 wages, and the difficulties involved in claiming grievance in labour courts or labour
43
44 standards offices when physically absent (Caron 2005)⁵. Often, when temporary 45
46 contract migrants lose their job (even in cases of unfair dismissal) they are made to 47
48 return home and, as a result, have no channels available for recourse.
49
50
51
52
53

54
55 To sum up, the almost universal problems related to work faced by migrant workers, 56
57 especially those with temporary or seasonal status, are non- or underpayment of 58
59 wages (not migrant specific), work contracts tied to (often inadequate and overpriced) 60

1
2
3 accommodation, and work permits tied to a specific employer or sector (including
4 live-in arrangements for domestic workers). All of this renders migrants vulnerable
5 and insecure, hence reluctant to voice complaints. An additional problem is the 6 violation of freedom of association which is widespread in Asia for local as well as 7 foreign workers (Piper 2006). In Europe, the problem tends to be of informal, rather 8 than formal, barriers that hamper greater unionisation of migrant workers.
9
10 11 12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20
21

22 Political mobilisation of temporary migrants

23
24 The situation of temporary contract workers today poses a marked difference to what 25 the existing literature on political mobilisation of migrants has highlighted, including 26 trade unions' responses⁶. One of the elements which distinguish contemporary flows 27 from earlier waves of (post-war) migration to the North is the institutional and 28 structural context of weaker unions and deregulated labour markets in which current 29 temporary migration occurs. Few studies have explored the specifics surrounding the 30 organisational support structure for this particular group of migrants, and those which 31 do are mostly on intra-Asian migration (Ford 2004, Piper 2006, Wee and Sim 2005)
32 or the US context (Chun 2008).
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47

48 With regard to these contemporary developments, unions increasingly have to own up 49 to the reality that temporary migrant workers play an increasingly important role in 50 regional and national labour markets beyond the mere filling of jobs – migrants also 51 work to discipline domestic labour in a number of ways (Sharma 2006). In this 52 context, trans-institutional and transnational networking is a vital form of organising, 53 as I argue here.
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Parallel to the downscaling of trade unions' relevance, a rise in the numbers of 4
5 migrant associations and NGOs can be witnessed globally advocating more
6
7 specifically for migrants' labour rights regardless of their legal status and the jobs
8
9 they perform. Thus, NGOs have addressed the precarious position of many migrant 10
11 workers in informal (and often feminised) 'sector' jobs typically not tackled by trade 12
13 unions (Ford and Piper 2007; Piper 2008d).
14
15
16
17
18
19

20 In order to incorporate migrant workers into the overall political struggle to uphold 21
22 workers' rights in general and to address temporary or undocumented migrants'
23
24 specific grievances, recent studies have argued for a need to enhance collaboration 25
26 between trade unions and migrant organisations to build upon, or complement, their 27
28 respective strengths and weaknesses (Piper and Ford 2006). Cross-organisational 29
30 collaboration has also been identified as important in the context of 'portable justice'⁷
31
32 (Grugel and Piper 2007). Migrant worker organisations can benefit from trade union 33
34 structures as unions tend to have the financial leverage and political clout to force 35
36 "governments to govern" and to institute their own legislation to support migrants'
37
38 rights. In turn, it has been suggested that organising foreign workers can lead to a 39
40 reinvigoration of the overall labour movement (Piper 2005a; Campbell 2006). In this 41
42 sense, trade unions and NGOs are indispensable allies of not only migrant workers 43
44 but all workers. How can this work in practice and what kind of emerging trends are 45
46 we witnessing? These are questions I return to below.
47
48
49
50
51
52

53 Bridging perspectives on migrant activism: social movements and transnational 54 55 activism

56
57 Migrants, especially temporary contract workers, are without doubt among the most 58
59 marginalised and invisible, especially in policy terms (Grugel and Piper 2007). There 60

1
2
3 are considerable obstacles to their organisation into effective social movements,
4
5 whether at the local, national, regional or global levels. When they participate in the 6
7 labour market, they can be found at the very bottom of the hierarchy, performing 8 9 work nobody else wants to do in sectors such as agriculture, domestic work, in 10 11 factories which are at the bottom of global production chains, and sex tourism. They 12
13 are often 'undocumented'. Their issues and concerns are often hidden from 14
15 mainstream society and the attention of the wider public. There is still little public 16
17 awareness of their day-to-day roles in society and the economy. As a result, they 18
19 suffer high levels of social exclusion and are targets of low, if any, social spending.
20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

“(T)heir transnationality (being simultaneous ‘constituents’ of both origin and destination countries) means that state responsibilities are difficult to attribute and easy to evade” (Grugel and Piper, 2007:152). The result is that migrants are among those groups of marginalised people who face immense difficulties in winning, for themselves, a discursive recognition of their rights.

The concept of social movement - with its emphasis firmly placed upon bottom-up citizen protest - is useful to highlight the importance of advocacy as an act to galvanise support for marginalised groups in society. But the concept itself has its limitations, as argued by Sikkink who sees its main failure in not portraying accurately the full range of actors involved in social justice and human rights issues beyond specific types of civil society organisations (1993). She refers to this broader set of organisations as an “international issue network”, an idea further developed by her and Keck in their seminal work on “transnational advocacy networks” (Keck and Sikkink 1998). Similarly, I have elsewhere established the argument for a focus on

1
2
3 transnational activism as it allows the inclusion of many different types of actors and 4
5 thus, leads to an open or expansive perspective on advocacy networks (Piper and 6
7 Uhlin 2004).
8
9

10
11
12 What these approaches have in common is reference to NGOs and other civil society
13
14 organisations, including trade unions, as important actors in advocacy and political 15
16 activism. Where they convert is in treating them mainly as domestic actors (such as 17
18 Avcı and McDonald, 2000, on trade unions) or explicitly as transnational actors (see 19
20 Herod, 2007, on unions as transnational players). In the case of temporary migration 21
22 in particular, taking a transnational perspective is paramount.
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30

31 Transnationalism in migration scholarship

32
33
34

35
36 Transnational perspectives have also been developed by migration scholars in a 37
38 variety of ways, a full summary of which goes beyond the scope of this paper. The 39
40 transnationalisation of labour markets together with the rise in temporary migration
41
42 schemes requires us to adopt a transnational approach also to the issue of political 43
44 representation and activism of migrants as workers.
45
46
47
48
49

50
51 By highlighting the increasingly transnational workforce and transnational 52
53 overlapping of societies, Johnston (2001) makes direct reference to immigrant labour, 54
55 documented and undocumented, in his work on labour as part of a broader citizenship
56
57 movement in the US. This, according to him, requires a re-conceptualisation of 58
59 conventional perspectives on citizenship. New approaches and strategies are needed 60

1
2
3 to address critical problems faced by migrant workers in their role as foreigners as 4
5 well as labourers in certain sectors that are associated with the “three Ds” (dangerous,
6
7 difficult, dirty), epitomised by the construction sector, agriculture, sweatshop and 8
9 domestic work. There is growing realisation that ‘coalitions of organisations’ can 10
11 exert far more influence than single organisations by themselves.
12
13
14

15
16
17 Recent transnational perspectives that introduce an understanding of migration as 18
19 involving social processes that bridge countries of origin and destination also include 20
21 the realm of politics (Sørensen et al., 2002). Østergaard-Nielsen (2002), for instance, 22
23 discusses how politics in the country of origin filter into political activism in the 24
25 country of destination but this tends to be mostly about so-called ‘homeland’ politics.
26
27 She argues that transnational political networks engage in democratic processes in 28
29 Turkey and Germany by using ‘democracy’ as a variable that allows for the 30
31 differential effectiveness of political networks in each country. Thus, transnationalism 32
33 emerges in her analysis also as an obstacle in policy making and implementation.
34
35
36 37
38
39
40

41 What remains, however, largely is missing in studies on political transnationalism is a 42
43 consideration for the role of the labour movement and the role of traditional worker
44
45 organisations, i.e. trade unions, in responding transnationally to the situation of 46
47 increasing numbers of temporary migrant workers. This ‘missing link’ to trade unions
48
49 has partly to do with the little engagement that trade unions have so far made with this 50
51 specific group of migrants. The short-term nature of such migratory flows has 52
53 implications for traditional approaches to ‘membership’ in trade unions in the 54
55 destination countries. Another reason is that migrants tend to work in sectors that are 56
57 regarded as impossible to organise or in jobs that are not recognised as ‘proper’ work, 58
59
60

1
2
3 as in the case of domestic work which is often explicitly excluded from national 4 labour laws. To operate transnationally, however, is vital in two regards: (1) to assist 5 migrants in claiming their labour rights and address widespread malpractices on the 6 part of employers; (1) to direct political activism not only toward destination
7 governments' policies, but also origin governments' policies. Yet, to date, trade
8 unions have by and large tended to be more nationally oriented. The political void left
9 by trade unions has to some extent been filled by NGOs. But more recently, unions
10 have begun to embark upon reform processes as evident from slogans such as "unions 11 without borders" (Bacon 2001; Kloosterboer, 2007; Piper and Ford 2006). I return to 12 this below.
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31

32 Networks

33
34
35
36 Within migration studies, network theory has mostly been approached from socio-37 cultural and/or spatial perspectives, whereby the political sphere at the meso level of 38 organisations has not yet received sufficient attention (Piper, 2008b; Pries 2007).
39 40
41
42 Social movement scholars and political scientists working on advocacy networks, on 43 the other hand, have investigated the transnational sphere of such network activities 44 and the transnational nature of the issues advocated for, as well as the transnational 45 form of such activism⁸, but hardly beyond the context of NGOs, neglecting trade
46 unionism and, thus, an important element of collective political action. Migrant 47 worker organising has, therefore, not sufficiently been looked at from a transnational 48 nor trans-institutional perspective. In migration studies, network theory has mainly 49 been applied at the individual level to analyse migrants' decision making, flows of 50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 information and the geographic direction of migratory movements. There is very little 4
5 work that maps out the 'politics of migration' in terms of the involvement of multiple 6
7 organisations (NGOs, migrant associations, and trade unions) from a national as well
8
9 as transnational network perspective.
10
11

12
13
14
15 As mentioned above, there is a great deal of academic writing on the subject of trade
16
17 union reforms but a detailed summary goes beyond the scope of this article⁹.
18

19 20 Conceptually the most interesting and relevant contributions as far as this paper is 21
22 concerned is the work by Waterman (2003) on social movement unionism and 23
24 Johnston (2001) on 'labour as citizenship movement'. These concepts, amongst other, 25
26 allude to the issue that having a 'voice' at the workplace does not necessarily translate 27
28 into having voice over other relevant public policy areas which relates to the point
29
30 made above about the need to cooperate with other advocacy organisations.
31
32
33

34
35
36 Waterman (2003, 2005)'s notion of 'social movement unionism' is based on the broad 37
38 argument that the crisis of trade unionism is rooted in the fact that the labour 39
40 movement is still understood in organisational/institutional terms when it needs to be 41
42 understood in networking/communicational ones (as new social movements have 43
44 done). Both he and Johnston argue that, although labour is not the only source for 45
46 social change, it constitutes an important ally and would achieve its full potential if 47
48 aligned with other democratic social movements. With traditional workers and unions 49
50 no longer being the norm of political struggle for social justice, labour movements
51
52 have to rethink their way of operating.
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Although the notion of social movement unionism has in fact been developed in the 4
5 case of a number of non-western countries, most notably South Korea and South
6
7 Africa, it has also been employed by western scholars to argue for the much needed
8
9 revitalisation and reform of conventional trade unionism in the west (Moody 1998). A 10
11 few scholars based in the US and Canada have made reference to similar notions in 12
13 the specific context of immigrants under the heading of ‘community unionism’ (e.g.
14
15 Cranford and Ladd 2003), or by discussing specific campaigns such as ‘Janitors for 16
17 Justice’ or fair wage campaigns where coalitions between trade unions, grass root or 18
19 community organisations and university staff/students were formed (Aguiar 2006; 20
21 Savage 2006). Trade unions themselves have also published documents
22
23 acknowledging the need for a social movement unionism approach and 24
25 “comprehensive campaigning” that is to focus not only on workers’ direct material 26
27 interests but to include broader issues such as human rights and social justice by 28
29 forming coalitions with an array of community organisations. For example, the Dutch 30
31 FNV has identified the organising the low wage service economy with its high share 32
33 of ethnic minority or migrant workers as an important element of their political 34
35 activities (Kloosterboer, 2007, p. 22).
36
37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45

46 Recent studies on migrant worker NGOs in the Southeast Asian context have argued 47
48 on a similar line: that regular collaboration with trade unions would enhance NGOs’
49
50 advocacy efforts and vice versa (Piper and Ford 2006). The specific situation of many 51 52 migrant workers highlights the importance of organisational representation and the 53
54 formation of alliances as well as networks across space, institutions and issue-
55
56 specificism (human rights, women’s rights, workers’ rights) to address the complexity 57
58 of migrants’ rights. In the Philippines, the notion of social movement unionism is well 59
60

1
2
3 understood by some trade unionists, even if in practical terms it has not been realized
4
5 based on a number of obstacles (Alcid 2006).
6
7
8
9

10
11 To recap, I have argued for an analytical framework which builds upon and expands
12 social movement scholarship by emphasizing the importance of trans-institutional 13 networking in order for migrant rights activism to gain more strength and, thus,
14 greater influence on policy making and implementation. This is analytically well 15 captured by the notion of 'social movement unionism'. The two crucial sets of 16 organisations which constitute the major elements of social movement unionism are 17 trade unions and social justice NGOs. By extending this to the transnational sphere, 18 this type of political activism reflects the nature of migration, especially temporary 19 migration. The manner of operationalising is in form of networks and alliances, built 20 within and across borders.
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34

35
36
37 A number of scholars have, in fact, emphasised the importance of NGO-trade union 38 alliance in order to revive, or enhance, the effectiveness of collective organising and 39 demonstrated by way of concrete examples or case studies an emerging trend in this 40 direction (see Gallin on 'necessary partnership', 2000; Development in Practice, 41 special issue 2004 on 'trade union and NGO relations'; Piper and Ford, 2006, on 42 'partnership in progress' in the context of migrant workers). What emerges in these 43 works as a common thread, as well as those concepts discussed above on civil 44 society's influence on public policy, in a more or less explicit manner is the 45 significance of networks – transnationally as well as across organisations.
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 When linking the notion of social movement unionism to the concept of networks,
4
5 civil society organisations involved in migrant rights advocacy are situated within an 6
7 integrated, yet open web of organisational networks, with the potential to address an 8
9 array of issues that pertain to migrants as workers, as members of families and 10 11 communities (Piper 2008a). The networking form, premised on the existence of 12
13 relevant organisations or the capacity to establish new ones, is, thus, also a future-14
15 oriented concept – and in this sense normative and prescriptive.
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26

27 Examples of such complex networks

28
29
30
31
32 Networks to support and advocate for migrant workers are being instigated by unions 33
34 or other civil society organisations, depending on the specific type of migrant or the 35
36 type of work these migrants are involved in. As far as trade unions are concerned, 37
38 national union centres in the western world seem at the forefront of new initiatives on 39
40 incorporating migrant workers into the labour movement, based to a large extent on 41
42 the decrease in membership of traditional constituents. This has also to do with the 43
44 fact that they are still blessed with larger pools of resources that many unions in the 45
46 non-western world cannot draw on. Also, in Europe, the regional trade union structure
47
48 clearly is also a reflection of, or a response to, the institutional set-up of the European 49
50 Union¹⁰.
51
52
53
54
55
56

57
58 In Europe, trade unions have also begun to engage in concrete forms of transnational 59
60 networking to support and protect migrant workers. One such example is the

1
2
3 establishment of a migrant worker branch by the TGUW in Southampton which caters
4
5 for newly arrived Polish workers. In addition to organising Polish migrants who have 6
7 come to the UK as part of the latest wave of A8 nationals – facilitated by the hiring of 8
9 a Polish speaking trade unionist – this union is said to attempt to link up with unions 10
11 in Poland also (Campbell 2006). Another such example is the newly established 12
13 European Migrant Workers Union that was founded by the IG Bau (Germany's Trade 14
15 Union for Building, Forestry, Agriculture and the Environment) in 2004 as the first 16
17 such organisation to be formed within the European trade union movement. This new 18 19 union addresses posted and seasonal workers in all industries, with specific focus on 20 21 migrant workers in agriculture and construction in its initial phase. The aim is to 22
23 provide those workers with legal assistance and advice, support them in the event of 24
25 sickness or accident and help them to receive correct payment for work done and 26
27 promote the provision of better accommodation. This new organisations concentrates 28
29 its activities also on migrant workers from Poland and the aim is to set up offices in 30
31 all the countries of origin of migrant workers, with the first being in Poland. These 32
33 initiatives, thus, clearly involve a transnational dimension in their organisational 34
35 networking.
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45

46 With regard to trans-institutional alliances and networks, the domestic worker NGO
47
48 Kalayaan in London successfully campaigned for regularisation and independent 49
50 migration status for foreign domestic workers who had become overstayers in the UK, 51
52 and one contributing factor to this success was the close and consistent working 53
54 relationship with the Transport and General Workers Union (RESPECT 1998).
55
56 Domestic worker supporting networks have also been formed across regions of which 57
58 CARAM Asia and RESPECT are two examples. The former which stands for 59
60

1
2
3
4 Coordination of Action Research on AIDS and Mobility is not only exclusively 5
6 concerned with domestic worker related concerns, but also health and other migration
7
8 issues. As a follow up to a regional summit on domestic workers in 2002, CARAM
9
10 Asia adopted the 'Colombo Declaration' listing rights of domestic workers. This 11
12 summit was attended not only by NGOs from within Asia but also trade unions. The 13
14 Europe-wide network RESPECT (which stands for Rights, Equality, Solidarity, 15
16 Power, Europe, Co-operation, Today) was set up in 1998 to campaign on very similar 17
18 issues – to boost the respect and recognition of domestic workers' rights. This 19
20 network also involves trade unions.
21
22
23
24
25
26

27
28 The coalition building activities across various nationality groups and different types 29
30 of organisations to campaign on behalf of foreign domestic workers have been 31
32 particularly well documented in the context of Hong Kong (Law 2002; Wee and Sim 33
34 2005). Asia is also interesting with regard to an ever expanding regional network of 35
36 migrant worker associations which form the Migrant Forum in Asia (MFA), 37
38 headquartered in Manila. Trade unions have begun to be part of this network too 39
40 which is also part of an international network, Migrant Rights International (MRI) 41
42 based in Geneva.
43
44
45
46
47

48
49 The probably oldest and most extensive European network of social and economic 50
51 justice NGOs that has included migrant worker organisations is SOLIDAR which was 52
53 founded in 1948 (then under a different name) and comprises of 42 members in 20
54
55 countries in Europe and beyond. This networks works in alliance with trade unions, 56
57 the labour movement and various civil society organisations including think tanks and 58
59 foundations such as the Friedrich Ebert Stiftung (which is also active on migrant 60

1
2
3 worker issues in Asia, see Barriga and Herberg 2006). SOLIDAR's activities are 4 concentrated in the field of social policy, employment and development with specific 5 campaigns revolving around "Decent Work for a Decent Life" and "Take Part!", a 6 migration specific project undertaken between June 2006 and December 2007 with 7 the broad aim of starting a dialogue between NGOs involved in providing services to 8 migrants and migrant organisations. Among its findings are that the involvement of 9 migrant organisations in the selected EU countries is still insufficient and 10 unstructured, with the result of duplication of efforts and even competition for 11 funding.
12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26

27 What remains unclear from these examples are the specific dynamics involved in 28 networking transnationally and trans-institutionally, leaving questions such as the 29 extent to which these alliances and coalitions are built in view of long-term
30 relationships that go beyond individual campaigns unanswered.
31
32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41 42

43 Conclusion

44
45
46
47
48 International migration poses a new challenge in the subject area of migrants' rights
49 activism and the way forward seems to lie in transnational and trans-institutional 50 networking and coalition building among migrant associations and trade unions which 51 have key leadership roles to play in generating strategies, common approaches and in 52 mobilising societies to ensure the fair and equal treatment of migrant workers. Given 53 the increasingly restrictive migration policies by destination countries globally, the 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 insecure and vulnerable position of temporary contract workers and the 4
5 undocumented have the potential to reinvigorate labour activism if organisations were 6
7 to overcome institutional and other barriers. The way forward for the various 8 9 organisations involved in labour activism seems “to go transnational” and engage in 10
11 networking across institutions. This links up to the argument made for a broader 12
13 social movement unionism based on inter-organisational networking between trade 14
15 unions and other social justice organisations as well as intra-organisational 16
17 networking across national borders (‘unions without borders’) in order to revive the 18
19 labour movement more generally.
20
21
22
23
24
25
26

27 Yet, despite emerging studies in the area of transnational migrant politics and 28
29 organisational networks by or on behalf of migrants, many questions are still 30
31 unaddressed and deserve further exploration. For example, how exactly the 32
33 transnational nature of migration is reflected in the transnational and transinstitutional
34
35 operating of social justice organisations - and the obstacles involved – is an issue that 36
37 deserves more attention. Sector-specific studies in particular would enhance our 38
39 understanding of the opportunities and obstacles to specific partnership models. The 40
41 significance of other civil society groups (e.g. lawyer associations, faith-based 42
43 organisations, professional associations) as actors in promoting migrants’ rights and 44
45 their positioning within existing nodes and networks remain an unexplored issue also.
46
47
48
49 Last but not least, the precise nature, feasibility, and sustainability of social movement
50
51 unionism in the transnational context of temporary contract migration requires further 52
53 research (as also argued by Vandenberg 2006).
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Overall, there are still significant conceptual and empirical gaps in our knowledge that 4
5
6 revolve around the feasibility and practicality of transnational policy making and the 7
8
9 role of organisations in migrant rights advocacy and service provisioning.

10 11 12 13 14 15 References

16
17
18
19
20 AGUIAR, LUIS L.M. 2006 'Janitors and sweatshop citizenship in Canada', 21
22 Antipode, vol. 38, no. 3, pp. 440-461

23
24
25
26
27 ALCID, MARY LOU L. 2006 'NGO-labor union cooperation in the promotion of the 28
29 rights and interests of landbased overseas Filipino workers', Asian and Pacific 30
31
32 Migration Journal, vol. 15, no. 3, pp. 335-358

33
34
35
36 AVCI, GAMZE and MCDONALD, CHRISTOPHER 2000 'Chipping Away at the 37
38 Fortress: Unions, Immigration and the Transnational Labour Market', International 39
40
41 Migration, vol. 38, no. 2, pp. 191-207

42
43
44
45
46 BACON, DAVID 2001 'Unions Without Borders', The Nation, 4 January 2001.
47
48 (<http://www.thenation.com/doc/20010122/bacon/print>), accessed 19 May 2008 49
50

51
52
53 BARRIGA, Joanne C. and HERBERG, MIRKO 2006 'Engaging with Migration
54
55 Issues: The Work of FES in the Philippines and Southeast Asia', Asian and Pacific 56
57
58 Migration Journal, vol. 15, no. 3, pp. 425-430
59
60

1
2
3 BAUDER, HARALD 2005 'Barriers Blocking the integration of Foreign-Trained
4 Immigrant Professionals', Research Papers, University of Guelph, Ontario, Canada.
5
6 (http://www.uoguelph.ca/geography.research/ffw/papers/immigrant_credentials.pdf),
7
8 accessed 11 March 2008
9
10 11

12
13
14
15
16
17 BRIGGS, CHRIS 2001 Immigrants, Unions, and the New U.S. Labor Market, 18
19 Temple University Press, Philadelphia 20 21

22
23
24 CAMPBELL, DAVID (2006), 'Poles are bringing solidarity back into fashion in Britain', The 25
26 Guardian, December 6, 2006, p. 32
27
28
29

30
31 CARON, CATHLEEN 2005 Global Workers Require Global Justice: The Portability
32
33 of Justice Challenge for Migrants in the USA. Discussion Paper, Committee on 34
35 Migrant Workers, Day of General Discussion on Protecting the Rights of all Migrant 36
37 Workers as a Tool to Enhance Development, 15 December 2005, Geneva
38
39 40

41
42
43 CASTLES, STEPHEN 2006 'Guestworkers in Europe: A Resurrection?', 44
45 International Migration Review, vol. 40, no. 4, pp. 741-766
46
47
48
49

50
51 CHUN, JENNIFER JIHYE 2008 'The Limits of Labor Exclusion: Redefining the 52
53 Politics of Split Labor Markets under Globalization', Critical Sociology, vol. 34, no.
54
55 3, pp. 433-452.
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 CRANFORD, CYNTHIA and LADD, DEENA 2003 'Community unionism:
4 organising for fair employment in Canada', Just Labour, vol. 3, pp. 46-59
5
6
7
8
9

10 DAVID, NATACHA (n.d.) 'Migrants get unions back to basics', Trade Union World, 11 <http://www.oit.org/public/english/dialogue/actrav/publ/129/12.pdf>, accessed 11 12
13
14
15 October 2007
16
17
18
19

20 DEVELOPMENT IN PRACTICE 2004 'Trade unions and NGO relations in 21 development and social justice', Special Issue, vol. 14, nos. 1-2, pp. 13-285
22
23
24
25
26

27 DRINKWATER, STEPHEN and BLACKABY, DAVID 2004 'Migration and Labour Market
28 Differences: The Case of Wales', IZA Discussion Paper No. 1275, Bonn: Institute for the Study 29 30
31 of Labour
32
33
34 35
36

37 FORD, MICHELE 2004 'Organizing the unorganizable: Unions, NGOs and 38 Indonesian migrant labour', International Migration, vol. 42, no. 5, pp. 99-119.
39
40
41
42
43

44 FORD, MICHELE 2006 'Migrant Labor NGOs and Trade Unions: A Partnership in 45 Progress?', Asian and Pacific Migration Journal, vol. 15, no. 3, pp. 299-312.
46
47
48
49
50

51 FORD, MICHELE and PIPER, NICOLA 2007 'Southern sites of female agency:
52 informal regimes and female migrant labour resistance in East and Southeast Asia', in 53
54 John Dobson and Lenard Seabrooke (eds), Everyday International Political Economy, 55
56
57
58
59
60 Cambridge University Press, pp. 63-80

1
2
3 GALLIN, DAN 2000 Trade Unions and NGOs: A Necessary Partnership for Social 4
5 Development. Civil Society and Social Movements Programme Paper No. 1, 6
7
8 UNRISD, Geneva
9

10
11
12 GRUGEL, JEAN B. and PIPER, NICOLA 2007 Critical Perspectives on Global Governance:
13
14 Rights and Regulation in Governing Regimes, London: Routledge 15
16

17
18
19
20 HEROD, ANDREW 2007 'The agency of labour in global change: reimagining the 21
22 spaces and scales of trade union praxis within a global economy', in: John Hobson 23
24 and Lenard Seabrooke (eds), Everyday Politics of the World Economy, Cambridge 25
26 University press, pp. 27-44.
27
28

29
30
31 HUGO, GRAEME, RUDD, DIANE and HARRIS, KEITH 2003 Australia's 32
33 Diaspora: Its Size, Nature and Policy Implications. CEDA Information Paper No. 80, 34
35
36 Melbourne: Committee for the Economic Development of Australia
37
38

39
40
41 ICFTU-APRO (International Confederation of Free Trade Unions-Asian and Pacific 42
43 Regional Organisation) 2003 Migration Issues Concern Trade Unions. Singapore: 44
45 ICFTU-APRO
46
47

48
49
50 ILO (International Organisation for Labour) 2004 Towards a Fair Deal for Migrant 51
52 Workers in the Global Economy. Geneva: ILO.
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 JOHNSTON, PAUL 2001 'Organize for what? The resurgence of labor as citizenship
4 movement', in Katz, Harry and Turner, Lowell (eds.), *Rekindling the Movement:
5 Labor's Quest for Relevance in the 20th Century*. Cornell University Press, Ithaca
6
7

8
9 10
11
12 KECK, MARGARET and SIKKINK, KATRHYN 1998 *Activists Beyond Borders:
13 Advocacy Networks in International Politics*, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press 14
15

16
17
18
19
20 KLOOSTERBOER, DIRK.2007 Innovative Trade Union Strategies. FNV, Utrecht 21

22
23
24
25 KOFMAN, ELEONORE 2007 'The Knowledge Economy, Gender and Stratified
26 Migrations', Studies in Social Justice, vol. 1, no. 2, pp. 122- 135 27
28

29
30
31
32 LAW, LISA 2002 'Sites of transnational activism – Filipino non-governmental 33 organizations in Hong Kong', in Brenda Yeoh, Peggy Teo and Shirlena Huang (eds), 34 Gender Politics in the Asia Pacific Region, Routledge, London 35
36 37

38
39
40
41 MARKOVA, E. and BLACK, RICHARD 2007 *East European immigration and community
42 cohesion*, York: Joseph Rowntree Foundation
43
44

45
46
47
48
49 MIGRATION ADVISORY COMMITTEE 2008 Accession Monitoring Report May 50 2004-September 2008, A8 countries, London: Home Office and UK Border Agency 51

52
53 MOODY, KIM 1998 Workers in A Lean World – Unions in the International 54 Economy, London: Verso
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 ØSTERGAARD-NIELSEN, EVA 2002 Transnational Politics – Turks and Kurds in 4
5
6 Germany, London: Routledge.
7
8
9

10
11 PIPER, NICOLA (2008a) 'The 'Migration-Development Nexus' Revisited from a 12
13 Rights Perspective', Journal of Human Rights, vol. 7, pp.1-18.
14
15

16
17 PIPER, NICOLA (2008b) 'Feminization of Migration in Asia and the Social 18
19 Dimensions of Development', Third World Quarterly, vol. 29, no. 7, pp. 1287-1303 20 21
22

23
24 PIPER, NICOLA 2008c 'International Migration and Gendered Axes of 25
26 Stratification– Introduction', in: Nicola Piper (ed), New Perspectives on Gender and 27
28 Migration – Livelihood, Rights, and Entitlements, London: Routledge, pp. 1-18 29
30
31

32
33 PIPER, NICOLA 2008d 'Political Participation and Empowerment of Foreign 34
35 Workers - Gendered Advocacy and Migrant Labour Organising in Southeast and East 36
37 Asia', Nicola Piper (ed), New Perspectives on Gender and Migration – Livelihood, 38
39 Rights, and Entitlements, London: Routledge, pp. 249-275
40
41
42

43
44 PIPER, NICOLA 2007 'Migration and Social Development: Organizational and 45 46 Political Dimensions', Paper presented at the International Conference Migration and 47
48 Social Policy in Developing Countries, Stockholm, November 2007 (available on line 49
50
51 at 52
53
54
55 http://www.unrisd.org/unrisd/website/document.nsf/\(httpPublications\)/370A8EE6FB7/370A8EE6FB73B0D4C12574F000353C3F?OpenDocument)
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 PIPER, NICOLA 2006 'Opportunities and Constraints for Migrant Worker Activism
4 in Singapore and Malaysia –Freedom of Association and the Role of the State', Asian
5
6
7
8
9 10 11 12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

PIPER, NICOLA 2006 'Opportunities and Constraints for Migrant Worker Activism in Singapore and Malaysia –Freedom of Association and the Role of the State', Asian and Pacific Migration Journal, vol. 14, no. 9, pp. 359-380

PIPER, NICOLA 2005a 'Transnational Politics and the Organising of Migrant Labour in Southeast Asia – NGO and Trade Union Perspectives', Asia-Pacific Population Journal, vol. 20, no. 3, pp. 87-110

PIPER, NICOLA 2005b 'Rights of Foreign Domestic Workers – Emergence of Transnational and Transregional solidarity?', Asian and Pacific Migration Journal, vol. 14, no. 1-2, pp. 97-120

PIPER, NICOLA and FORD, MICHELE (eds) 2006 'Migrant NGOs and Labor Unions: A Partnership in Progress?', Asian and Pacific Migration Journal, vol. 14, no. 9, 2006 (whole issue)

PIPER, NICOLA and UHLIN, ANDERS 2004 'New perspectives on transnational activism', in Nicola Piper and Anders Uhlin (eds), Transnational Activism in Asia – Problems of power and democracy, London: Routledge, pp. 1-25

PRIES, LUDGER 2007 'Transnationalism: Trendy Catchall or Specific Research Programme? A Proposal for Transnational Organisation Studies as a micro-macro link', COMCAD Working Paper no. 34, University of Bielefeld: COMCAD

RESPECT 1998 'Migrant Women Domestic Workers Demand RESPECT', newsletter October 1998, Brussels: Solidar

1
2
3
4
5
6 RUHS, MARTIN 2006 'The potential of temporary migration programmes in future
7 international migration policy', International Labour Review, vol. 145, no. 1-2, pp. 7-8
9 36
10 11

12
13
14
15 SAVAGE, LYDIA 2006 'Justice for janitors: Scales of organizing and representing 16 workers', Antipode, vol. 38, no. 3, pp. 645-666
17
18 19 20

21
22 SHARMA, N. 2006 Home Economics: Nationalism and the Making of Migrant 23 Workers in Canada. University of Toronto Press, Toronto
24
25
26

27
28
29 SIKKINK, KATHRYN 1993 'Human Rights, Principled Issue-Networks and 30 Sovereignty in Latin America', International Organization, vol. 47, no. 3, pp. 411-31
32 441.
33
34

35
36 SØRENSEN, NINNA NYBERG, VAN HEAR, NICHOLAS N, ENGBERG-
37
38 PEDERSEN, PEDER 2001. The Migration Development Nexus Evidence and Policy
39 Options – State of the Art Overview. CDR Working Paper 02.6. Centre for 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60
Development Research, Copenhagen.

TLWG (Temporary Labour Working Group) (2007) The journey to licensing, London: TLWG. (http://www.eti2.org.uk/Z/lib/2007/02/tlwg-journey/twlg_journey_to_licensing.pdf) (accessed 19 May 2008)

TUC (Trade Union Congress) 2007 The Economics of Migration – managing the impacts, London: TUC

1
2
3
4
5
6 VANDENBERG, ANDREW 2006 'Social-Movement Unionism in theory and in 7
8 Sweden', Social Movement Studies, vol. 5, no. 2, pp. 171-191
9

10
11 12 VERITÉ 2005 Protecting Overseas Workers – Research Findings and Strategic 13 14 Perspectives on Labor Protections for Foreign Contract Workers in Asia and the 15
16 Middle East, Unpublished Research Paper, Verité, Amherst: MA
17
18 19 20

21
22 WATERMAN, PETER 2003 Adventures of Emancipatory Labour Strategy as the 23
24 New Global Movement Challenges International Unionism
25

26
27 <http://groups.yahoo.com/group/GloSoDia/files/LABOUR%20INTERNATIONALIS>
28
29 M/, accessed 10 June 2006.
30
31

32
33
34 _____ 2005 'Trade Unions, NGOs and Global Social Justice: Another Tale to Tell', 35
36 in TUs and NGOs Review, http://www.choike.org/nuevo_eng/informes/1872.html, 37
38 accessed 21 August 2006.
39
40

41
42
43 WEE, VIVIENNE and SIM, AMY 2005 'Hong Kong as a destination for migrant 44
45 domestic workers', in Shirlena Huang, Brenda S.A. Yeoh and Noorashikin Abdul 46
47 Rahman (eds), Asian Women as Transnational Domestic Workers. Marshall 48
49 Cavendish, Singapore, pp. 56-73.
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 WICKRAMASEKARA, PIYASIRI 2008 'Globalisation, International Labour
4
5 Migration and the Rights of Migrant Workers, Third World Quarterly, vol. 29, no. 7, 6
7
8 pp. 1247-1264.
9

10 11 12 ----- 13
14
15 NICOLA PIPER is Senior Lecturer in the Department of Geography and Associate 16
17 Director of the Centre for Migration Policy Research at Swansea University.
18
19 ADDRESS: Department of Geography, Wallace Building, Swansea University, 20
21 Singleton Park, Swansea SA2 8PP, UK. Email: n.piper@swansea.ac.uk
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29 30
31
32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48

49
50 ¹ For a fairly detailed account of the various policy schemes in those regions, see Ruhs (2006).

51 ² However, some European countries also prohibit migrant domestic workers from reuniting with their 52 families at their destinations. Notable exceptions are Italy and Spain. And Asian governments tacitly 53 allow the presence of migrant workers over longer periods of term (often whole families in an 54 undocumented manner) without official recognition of settlement and official integration policies
55 (Piper 2008b).

56
57 ³ According to a more recent report by the Migration Advisory Committee (2008), however, it appears
58 as if migrants (at least as far as those from the A8 countries are concerned) are more evenly distributed 59 throughout the UK economy than suggested by the TUC report.

60 ⁴ This is often the case for local domestic workers as much as for foreign domestic workers, hence not a migration problem but a 'sector' specific problem. The inadequate legislative coverage of domestic workers will be addressed by the ILC (ILO's annual congress) in 2010 when beginning the drafting work for a new Homeworker Convention.

⁵ A statement published by PICUM (Platform for International Cooperation on Undocumented Migrants) on the EU plans to impose employer sanctions (dated 15 April 2008) point to this particular problem also (see www.picum.org; accessed 19 May 2008).

⁶ For a detailed literature review, see Piper 2007.

⁷ The notion of 'portable justice' captures the problem when undocumented migrants or temporary labour migrants are deported or sent back to their countries of origin upon completion of their contracts, but were not paid their wages, and the difficulties involved in claiming grievances in labour courts or labour standards offices when physically absent (Caron 2005). This problem, thus, has a transnational element (Piper 2008a).

⁸ For a detailed review of the literature, see Piper and Uhlin (2004).

⁹ Useful references can be found on http://www.crimt.org/2eSite_renouveau/Samedi_PDF/Cradden_Hall_Jones.pdf.

¹⁰ Such regional or sub-regional configurations are conducive for triggering transnational collaboration among unions. There is evidence from NAFTA countries US, Canada and Mexican unions also but without reference to migrant workers (Bacon 2001).