

HAL
open science

Transnational Political Practices of Colombians in Spain and the United Kingdom: Politics 'Here' and 'There

Anastasia Bermudez

► To cite this version:

Anastasia Bermudez. Transnational Political Practices of Colombians in Spain and the United Kingdom: Politics 'Here' and 'There. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 2010, 33 (1), pp.75-91. 10.1080/01419870903125838 . hal-00599891

HAL Id: hal-00599891

<https://hal.science/hal-00599891>

Submitted on 11 Jun 2011

HAL is a multi-disciplinary open access archive for the deposit and dissemination of scientific research documents, whether they are published or not. The documents may come from teaching and research institutions in France or abroad, or from public or private research centers.

L'archive ouverte pluridisciplinaire HAL, est destinée au dépôt et à la diffusion de documents scientifiques de niveau recherche, publiés ou non, émanant des établissements d'enseignement et de recherche français ou étrangers, des laboratoires publics ou privés.

Transnational Political Practices of Colombians in Spain and the United Kingdom: Politics 'Here' and 'There'

Journal:	Ethnic and Racial Studies
Manuscript ID:	RERS-2008-0150.R2
Manuscript Type:	Special Issue
Keywords:	Latin America, Political Participation, Spain, United Kingdom, Transnational Migration, Colombia

The Transnational Political Practices of Colombians in Spain and the United Kingdom: Politics 'Here' and 'There'

Abstract

Most existing scholarly work available on Colombian migrants' transnational political practices has emphasised the divisions, mistrust and apathy affecting them. However, research conducted by the author among Colombians in the United Kingdom and Spain departs from previous studies by stressing the broad nature of migrants' transnational political participation, which involves engagement in both formal and informal politics, at the individual and collective levels, and in initiatives coming from 'above' and 'below'. It also shows how transnational political practices oriented towards the home country occur simultaneously with activities in the host society, contrary to what has generally been thought. This was more the case among Colombians in Spain than those in the United Kingdom, which could be partly explained by differences in the historical development and size of each community, as well as the role played by individual factors, such as migrants' previous political experiences.

Keywords: transnational migration, political participation, Latin America, Spain, United Kingdom, Colombia

Introduction

The issue of migrants' political participation in host societies (mainly in the Global North) has received renewed attention, linked to the debates on migration and security

1
2 and the meaning of concepts such as nation-state and citizenship. This has been 3
4 discussed mainly within the framework of the political opportunity structure developed
5
6 for the study of social movements and later applied to migrants' mobilisation (Journal of 7
8 Ethnic and Migration Studies 2004, 2005; Peró 2007). At the same time, new 9
10 transnational approaches to the study of international migration have moved away from 11
12 the traditional focus on incorporation and acculturation towards the recognition that 13
14 migrants 'do not delink themselves from their home country; instead, they keep and 15
16 nourish their linkages to their place of origin' (Itzigsohn et al. 1999, p. 317). Initially,
17
18 studies of transnational migration focused on economic exchanges, but as research has 19
20 expanded, there has been growing recognition that 'transnational social fields' also 21
22 encompass political and symbolic links (ibid).
23
24
25
26
27
28
29

30 While the study of migrant political transnationalism has developed mainly out 31
32 of research on Latinos in the United States, the issue of political participation in the host
33
34 society has been discussed mostly in reference to long-established ethnic minority 35
36 groups, both in the United States and Europe. In the European context, there is an 37
38 ongoing public debate about migrants' political rights, especially in relation to voting
39
40 (see Bauböck 2006). More recently, there has also been growing interest in the 41
42 integration of new migrant groups, including Latin Americans. This article looks at the 43
44 little explored subject of Colombian migration to Spain and the United Kingdom, 45
46 focusing on migrants' political engagement. It first outlines the theoretical and 47
48 methodological approach to the research conducted, as well as the characteristics of the 49
50 communities studied. The second section focuses on the connections between 51
52 involvement in 'home' and 'host' politics, seeking to compare similarities and differences
53
54 across geographical locations, as well as highlighting the impact of individual factors.
55
56
57
58
59
60

Transnational migration and political participation

The transnational approach to migration focuses on how migrants 'forge and sustain multi-stranded social relations that link together their societies of origin and settlement' (Basch, Glick Schiller and Szanton Banc 1994, p. 5). This new way of looking at international migration did not emerge strongly until the second half of the nineties, mainly in the context of Latin American and Caribbean labour migration to the United States. Work later expanded to cover other migrations to this country, as well as other types of migration and different world regions. The transnational focus on migration in the European context is relatively recent (see Rogers 2000; Grillo 2001; Østergaard-Nielsen 2003).¹

Since then, there have been numerous studies looking at the conformation of 'transnational fields of action' or 'transnational social fields' (see, for instance, Faist 2000). These are defined as fields 'of social interactions and exchanges that transcend political and geographical boundaries' (Itzigsohn et al. 1999, p.317). Levitt and Nyberg-Sørensen (2004) find this concept useful for two reasons: it links migrants with those who stay behind; and goes beyond the binary opposition between migrant incorporation (or integration) and transnationalism. Initially, the focus was mainly on economic and individual social exchanges, and especially on the importance of economic remittances, with interest on the political aspects developing later. Studies on the transnational political activities of migrants have been approached from various perspectives. Some have looked at the levels and types of political participation of migrants oriented towards the home country, especially focusing on Latinos in the US (see Guarnizo,

1
2 Portes and Haller 2003). Less has been done from the meso level with respect to 3
4 immigrant organisations (see Landolt and Goldring 2006; Portes, Escobar and Arana
5
6 2008). More recently, there has also been an emphasis on the state level, looking at the 7
8 political rights that nations afford their nationals abroad and the creation of programmes
9
10 to strengthen links with the diaspora (see Gamlen 2006 for an overview of this).
11
12

13
14
15
16 However, few studies have considered the connections between migrants'
17
18 transnational political practices and their integration in the host societies. Jones-Correa
19
20 (1998), in his research with Latinos in New York, argued that their low levels of 21
22 naturalisation and participation in formal politics in the US were the result not only of 23
24 political marginalisation, but also of their situation in a 'politics of in-between' based on 25
26 the 'myth of return'. However, for Portes and Rumbaut (2006, p. 138, emphasis in 27
28 original) when transnational political participation in the country of origin is measured 29
30 against political loyalties in the country of settlement, there is not 'a zero-sum game', but 31
32 rather 'many aspects of transnationalism end up accelerating the political integration of 33
34 immigrants in the United States'. This conclusion was later reinforced in another study 35
36 by Portes, Escobar and Arana (2008, p. 1085) of Latin American transnational and 37
38 ethnic organisations in the United States, where they concluded that '[t]ransnationalism
39
40 and political incorporation proceed simultaneously'.
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48

49
50 Bearing these issues in mind, the present article seeks to contribute to the 51
52 emerging transatlantic debate on migrant political mobilisation from a transnational 53
54 approach in the less studied European context (see Martiniello and Lafleur 2008). It
55
56 argues that migrant transnationalism and integration can be mutually reinforcing 57
58 processes, and should be seen as part of a continuum rather than as separate issues as 59
60

1
2 has been thought of until now. This finding is based on PhD research conducted by the 3
4 author on the transnational political connections of Colombian migrants in Spain
5
6 (Madrid/Barcelona) and the United Kingdom (London) during 2004-2007. The study 7
8 was qualitative, involving semi-structured interviews, participant observation and 9
10 content analysis of websites and other materials. In total, 96 people (49 in Spain and 47
11
12 in the UK) were interviewed, mostly Colombian migrants, but also some key experts
13
14 and officials. Since the aim was not to find a representative sample, the selection of 15
16 participants was driven by the characteristics of the research and involved mainly 17
18 Colombian migrants with some level of involvement in transnational politics.
19
20 Interviewees included refugees, labour migrants, professionals and students, as well as 21
22 people who had migrated for other reasons. Finally, the conceptual framework used a 23
24 wide definition of political activities, whether individual or collective, both formal and 25
26 informal.²
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34

35 Colombian migration abroad

36
37
38
39

40 Colombia has a long history of internal and external migrations, both forced and 41
42 voluntary. However, the phenomenon of substantial Colombian migration abroad is 43
44 very recent. Emigration rates started to climb up in the sixties and rapidly accelerated 45
46 throughout the nineties and into the twenty first century, as levels of violence and 47
48 insecurity in Colombia increased and economic conditions deteriorated. According to 49
50 current estimates, there are more than four million Colombians living abroad (or around 51
52 one in ten of the national population) (Colombia Nos Une 2008). Although it is assumed 53
54 that most Colombians migrate abroad for economic reasons, refugees have also 55
56 contributed to these flows.
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 Traditionally, migration in Colombia has tended to be internal, across borders
5
6 (mainly to Venezuela) and to the United States. However, from the nineties,
7
8 destinations have also diversified, both within the region and in other directions. Europe
9
10 was initially only a destination for the Colombian elite, political refugees, intellectuals
11
12 and others. However, in the seventies, as the UK government authorised the entry of 13
14 non-skilled migrants to work in services, between 4,000-10,000 Colombians arrived as 15
16 temporary workers. From the end of the eighties-beginning of the nineties, a third and 17
18 more important wave of emigration towards Europe (mainly Spain) started, as part of 19
20 wider Latin American flows (Semana 30/11/03). Spain and the United Kingdom
21
22 currently account for the first and second largest Colombian communities in Europe
23
24 respectively.³
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32

33 Colombians in the UK: a largely invisible community

34
35
36
37 Latin Americans are currently one of the fastest-growing migrant groups in the United 38
39 Kingdom, but this is still a recent and small community, and thus hardly visible (see 40
41 McIlwaine 2007; Peró 2007). According to Guarnizo (2006b), England, and London in 42
43 particular, had always occupied a special place for the Colombian upper classes, 44
45 attracting political leaders, young professionals and students. These linkages were later
46
47 widened to include all sectors of the Colombian population, especially from the 48
49 seventies. Today, estimates of the total number of Colombians in the United Kingdom
50
51 range from 50,000 to 150,000 (Guarnizo 2006b). A recent study (Open Channels 2000)
52
53 divides Colombian migration to the country into roughly three stages: 1975-1979, when 54
55 many came under the work permit system; 1980-1986, during which an increasing 56
57
58
59
60

1
2 number of Colombians arrived despite the ending of that system, as migration networks
3 became established; and 1986-1997, which saw an upsurge in the number of asylum-
4 seekers. Although the arrival of Colombian refugees in the United Kingdom dates back
5 to the seventies, numbers increased greatly during the following two decades as 6 violence in the country intensified, declining subsequently as immigration laws became 7 stricter. In addition, there are a significant number of Colombian students and 8 professionals in the country.
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17

20
21 Most Colombians, and Latin Americans in general, have settled in or around
22 London, especially in the boroughs of Lambeth, Islington, Southwark and Camden
23 (Open Channels 2000). As the community in London has increased in size, so also has 24 its heterogeneity.⁴ The majority of migrants have an urban, working- or middle-class
25 background, coming from Bogotá and other large and medium-size cities in the Valle
26 del Cauca, Eje Cafetero and Antioquia. They also have relatively high levels of formal 27 education. Despite this, most work in low-skilled activities, such as domestic and 28 industrial cleaning, catering or retail. Suggestions are that there are more women than 29 men, with the female ratio being 53.5%-58.7%. The majority of Colombians in London
30 are twenty-fifty years old and in the productive age bracket. The studies available
31 suggest that most Colombians migrate to the United Kingdom for socio-economic 32 reasons, with a small minority escaping political violence. However, other research has 33 highlighted the connections between the different types of migration, and the relevance
34 of violence and insecurity as explanatory factors (McIlwaine 2005).
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52

53
54
55
56 The larger, more recent Colombian community in Spain
57
58
59
60

1
2 In the last two decades, Spain has gone from being a country of emigration to one of 3
4 immigration. The composition of migration flows to Spain has also changed, from being 5
6 mainly Western European to a majority of migrants now coming from Africa, Latin
7
8 America and Eastern Europe. Traditionally, Colombian migration to Spain was mostly 9
10 by refugees, intellectuals and students. However, throughout the eighties, and especially 11
12 since the late nineties, the community has grown in size exponentially. Official data
13
14 estimates that there were just under 300,000 Colombians living in Spain at the 15
16 beginning of 2007 (INE 2008), making it among the five largest migrant communities
17
18 in the country. However, unofficial reports believe that the real figure could be much 19
20 higher given those migrants in an 'irregular' situation. Available research suggests that 21
22 they are mostly labour migrants, although violence and security were also important 23
24 reasons for migrating (IOM/UN 2003). In addition, a significant number of Colombian 25
26 students and professionals reside in Spain.
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34

35 Latin American migration to Spain has been highly 'feminised', mainly as a 36
37 result of the demand for women to work in domestic service. However, the data
38
39 available suggests that the feminisation rate for Colombians (58%) is not as high as that 40
41 of other nationalities (Pellegrino 2004). Most Colombians in Spain are economically 42
43 active (nineteen-forty four years old), although the proportion of under sixteens is 44
45 growing (IOM/UN 2003). On the whole, it seems to be a younger community than the 46
47 one in London, reflecting its more recent establishment. As in the United Kingdom, 48
49 Colombian migrants have relatively high levels of education, but tend to work mainly in 50
51 domestic service, followed by catering, construction and retail (IOM/UN 2003).
52
53 However, in contrast, the Colombian population in Spain is geographically spread. The 54
55 largest number by far live in the Madrid region, with a similar amount equally 56
57
58
59
60

1 distributed between Cataluña (mainly Barcelona) and Valencia (INE 2008). Most 2
3
4 Colombian migration to Spain originates from the same regions as UK flows. The 5
6 IOM/UN study (2003, pp. 176) found a close relationship between area of origin within 7
8
9 Colombia and specific destinations in Spain, which reflected 'the existence and great 10
11 importance of migratory networks, based on links related to family, community and 12
13 friendships' (own translation). These networks are key in the decision to migrate, the 14
15 organisation of the trip and the settlement of migrants, but are also evident in the links
16
17 maintained with the home country, not only at the personal and economic level
18
19 (remittances), but also politically.
20
21
22
23
24
25

26 The political experiences of Colombian migrants in Spain and the UK

27
28
29

30 The work available on US-based Colombian migrants' transnational political practices
31
32 has emphasised the divisions, mistrust, lack of involvement and apolitical nature of 33
34 these (Guarnizo and Díaz 1999; Guarnizo, Sánchez and Roach 1999; Guarnizo, Portes 35
36 and Haller 2003). However, my research with Colombians in the UK and Spain, using a 37
38 broad definition of what constitutes transnational politics, found widespread evidence of 39
40 engagement by migrants, calling into question previous findings. Most of the 41
42 Colombian migrants interviewed had some level of transnational political participation, 43
44 whether as individuals or as part of a group (or both).⁵ There was participation in both 45
46 formal and informal politics, at the individual and collective levels, and in initiatives
47
48 coming from 'above' and 'below' (see Smith and Guarnizo 1998). In many cases, 49
50 transnational political engagement with the home country coexisted with participation
51
52 in the politics of the host society, although not always at similar levels or at the same
53
54 time.
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4
5 Individual participation in formal politics at both ends
6
7
8

9 At the individual level, migrant engagement was mostly in formal politics, through 10 voting or active involvement in party politics (as a candidate, party member, 11 participating in meetings and election campaigns). Although the main focus of the 12 research conducted was on home country politics, at least six Colombians interviewed
13 (2 men and 2 women in Spain, 3 women in the United Kingdom) also talked about their 14 engagement in the politics of the host country.
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25

26 Colombians abroad enjoy wide political rights vis-a-vis their country of origin,
27 including the right to double citizenship under the 1991 constitution, as well as to vote
28 in presidential and congressional elections and be elected as a representative of the 29 diaspora.⁶ In addition, Colombians in Spain, despite being a recent migrant group, enjoy
30 special facilities to acquire Spanish nationality,⁷ a precondition for participating
31 formally in host country politics.⁸ This allowed some Colombian respondents to vote
32 both in their country of origin and in the host society. For some, like Andrew, a refugee 33 who arrived in Madrid in 1999, exercising the right to vote in both places was very 34 important. He had always voted in the Colombian elections, even from Spain, and had 35 found a way to vote in Spain even before acquiring Spanish nationality:⁹
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51

52 I have Spanish citizenship. During the last elections I was already Spanish, 53 but had not received my identity card yet, which meant that I could not 54 vote. But my boyfriend (...) was not interested in voting, so I asked him to 55 vote for me. On other occasions, friends have also voted for me. I find it
56
57
58
59
60

1
2 incredible that people do not vote if they can (...) Since they were not 3
4 voting, I asked them to do it for me and told them who to vote for.
5
6
7
8

9 Andrew had been a journalist in Colombia and had always 'liked politics a lot'.
10 Prior political experiences also helped shape migrants' levels and types of political 11 engagement in London. For Colombians in the United Kingdom, obtaining British 12 nationality can take more time.¹⁰ Nevertheless, according to Home Office (2008) data, 13 1,845 Colombians were granted British citizenship in 2007, the largest category in the 14 Americas after the United States and Jamaica. Three Colombian women interviewed in 15 London talked about their involvement in British politics. Two of them had migrated in 16 the eighties, the other in 1999, which means they were among the earliest arrivals. In 17 two cases, voting in UK elections was explained in relation to electoral participation in 18 Colombia. One woman explained that although she had never voted while living in 19 Colombia (she was in her early twenties at the time of migration) she had recently
20 started to vote in her country of origin prompted by her brother in Colombia, who was 21 actively involved in party politics. This had increased her interest in participating
22 electorally in the United Kingdom, and following her acquisition of British nationality
23 she had started to do so. By contrast, Julieta, who also had double nationality, explained
24 that she had never voted in Colombia or the United Kingdom, since she was 'not 25 inclined towards one side [political ideology/option] or another'. In her case, voting was 26 identified with party politics, something she disliked and did not want to become 27 involved in.
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55

56 Guarnizo (2006b), in his study of Colombians in London, also found a strong 57 correlation between electoral participation in both polities, with differences in the levels
58
59
60

1
2 and types of engagement. Among respondents in my study, this extended to more active
3
4 forms of involvement. Two women and one man in Spain, all refugees, and a woman in 5
6 the UK participated in party politics in both countries. For Elena, who had a personal 7
8 and family history of Left-wing activism before arriving in Spain in 2000, maintaining 9
10 her political activism had not been easy. Like many other migrants, her main 11
12 preoccupation had been sustaining herself and her family. However, she had managed 13
14 to keep up some level of involvement in Colombian politics, going to meetings, giving 15
16 talks and attending electoral events organised in Madrid. But this was not enough for 17
18 her so she had started to contact some Spanish parties closer to her ideological position.
19
20 She also justified this saying that she now had a daughter born in Spain, whom she 21
22 wanted to learn about the political history of both her country of birth and that of her
23
24 parents. Luis, on the other hand, participated in the 2006 Colombian elections, actively 25
26 mobilising in support of a new Left-wing movement, while at the same time helping to 27
28 organise a new Spanish party for immigrants: 'a party operating within the Spanish state
29
30 that is born out of the real need to make true the civic and political rights of migrants
31
32 and that aims to support other citizens' demands, creating new forms of citizen
33
34 participation' (party leaflet).
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44

45 This 'double militancy' was helping Latin American migrants, both in the UK
46
47 but especially in Spain, to slowly gain in political visibility. Yolanda Villavicencio, a 48
49 Colombian woman, was elected to the Madrid assembly in the 2007 local elections, the 50
51 first migrant of Latin American origin to occupy such a post. Since arriving in Spain in 52
53 the eighties, Yolanda had continued her political activism, first working around issues
54
55 of human rights and peace in Colombia and later defending the needs and rights of 56
57 migrants in the host society. She had become coordinator of Aesco (América, España, 58
59
60

1
2 Solidaridad y Cooperación / America, Spain, Solidarity and Cooperation), one of the
3
4 largest migrant organisations in Spain, and as well as fulfilling her responsibilities as a 5
6 Socialist deputy in the Madrid legislature, Yolanda remained actively involved in 7
8 Colombian politics. The story of Gloria Gómez, in London, is similar. She arrived in the 9
10 United Kingdom in the eighties and had a history of community involvement in 11
12 London, as well as being a member of a Colombian political party, and had been very 13
14 active in campaigning for Colombian elections from London. However, in her case it
15
16 was disillusionment with Colombian politics, and not only her desire to improve 17
18 conditions within her community, that led her to create the Latin Front and run for 19
20 election in the borough of Lambeth (she was not elected):
21
22
23
24
25
26
27

28 This year I am not campaigning because I am totally disillusioned, after 29
30 seeing the behaviour of the Colombian government towards Colombians
31
32 abroad. I am not interested in Colombian politicians contacting me during 33
34 election time, or when they need to count remittances ... I am more 35
36 interested in helping Colombians locally, and see how they can get on 37
38 their own feet and think by themselves (...) these are my political interests
39
40
41
42 at the moment.
43
44
45
46

47 These cases show that migrants can simultaneously engage in the politics of both 48
49 their home and host countries. Previous political experience seems to be key when 50
51 explaining migrant political engagement. It is mainly those Colombians with a prior 52
53 history of interest and active participation in politics who sought to maintain their 54
55 political engagement 'here' and/or 'there'. They were also long-term migrants, mostly 56
57 refugees, and both men and women. For many of these refugees, continuing their 58
59
60

1
2 political activism after migration was not only a matter of personal fulfillment, but also 3
4 a way to survive the experience of exile (see Bermúdez Torres 2003). Longer-term
5
6 residents, on the other hand, tend to have a more stable socio-economic position, as well
7
8 as the legal conditions, to participate more fully in the politics of the host society (at 9
10 least formally). Finally, the type and level of transnational and domestic political 11
12 involvement varied depending on context, with some migrants maintaining a double 13
14 militancy while others participated in one country or another in different ways and with 15
16 different intensity at different times. Nevertheless, the connections between 17
18 transnational and domestic politics were stronger in the case of Colombians in Spain
19
20 than in the UK, partly a reflection of historical ties as well as the size and characteristics
21
22 of the communities studied as further explored below.
23
24
25
26
27
28
29

30 Collective political mobilisation: the role of migrant organisations

31
32
33
34
35 Colombians in Spain and the UK have also been a key force behind the organisation and 36
37 collective activity of the wider Latin American migrant communities. This can probably 38
39 be explained by their numerical weight, as well as their high levels of human capital and 40
41 political experience. Two of the main Latin American migrant organisations in Madrid, 42
43 Aesco (see above) and Aculco (Asociación Socio-Cultural y de Cooperación al 44
45 Desarrollo por Colombia e Iberoamérica - Socio-Cultural and Cooperation
46
47 Development Association for Colombia and Latin America) were led by Colombians (a 48
49 woman and a man). Both were founded, with some Spanish participation, in the early 50
51 nineties with a very transnational approach, although with a different focus. Aesco
52
53 started as an example of what Østergaard (2003) calls 'diaspora' politics:¹¹
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2 This organisation was founded by people who arrived here in the eighties
3
4 (...) Colombians in search of asylum (...) They wanted to become involved
5
6 from here, to support the human rights struggle and the incipient civil 7
8 society movement for peace that started to emerge then (...) But later this 9
10 became frustrated, because the FARC, the main guerrilla force, did not 11
12 hand in their weapons, and negotiations with the government were broken 13
14
15
16 (Aesco coordinator, Madrid).
17
18
19
20

21 Aculco, on the other hand, started as an attempt to promote Colombian culture
22
23 abroad and counter the negative image of the country. However, as migration to Spain
24
25 started to accelerate, both organisations began to focus more on the local needs of 26
27 Colombian migrants, and later of the wider Latin American community. Their main 28
29 activities involved offering labour, legal, social and cultural assistance to migrants. But 30
31 this did not mean that the focus on the country of origin had disappeared completely;
32
33 the organisations' original political and cultural aims were still there, even if more 34
35 subdued. In addition, more recently, both organisations had become involved in the 36
37 promotion of development and co-development projects in Colombia.¹² At a more 38
39 political level, Aesco and Aculco had also in recent years undertaken initiatives aimed 40
41 at increasing the political participation of migrants both at the local level (in the host
42
43 society) and in the country of origin. As well as promoting the need to vote in 44
45 Colombian elections among migrants, both organisations were participating in the 46
47 mesas de diálogo y convivencia (neighbourhood committees for dialogue and 48
49 coexistence):
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58

59 [this is] a project of the Madrid town hall (...) an innovative process, but 60

1
2 we believe that we have to participate, and if this helps enhance citizen
3 participation, then it will be good. We think that participating in this 4 process might give people more opportunities for integration, and for 5 having their voices heard (...) This project is interesting because it allows 6 any person over sixteen to vote [candidates for the mesas], with the only 7 requisite that they are registered in their neighbourhood, so they do not
8 have to have legal migrant status or a residence permit (Aesco worker, 9 Madrid).

10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23 Thus, while fostering migrant participation more formally in Colombian politics, 24 given the lesser access of migrants to formal politics in the host society, these 25 organisations were promoting more informal ways of mobilisation. As in the individual 26 cases discussed above, this shows that migrant collective political engagement can also 27 combine a transnational and domestic approach, with focus, type and levels of activities
28 varying depending on contextual and other factors. However, this was less evident in the 29 case of the United Kingdom. In general, the strength of Latin American migrant 30 organisations in London was less, and they were more focused on solving the local 31 practical needs of migrants than on more political goals. Although the Colombian 32 community in the United Kingdom is older and heavily concentrated in London, it is 33 much smaller and has not been growing as fast and dynamically in recent years as the 34 one in Spain. In addition, the lack of 'ethnic' status of Latin Americans in the United 35 Kingdom has made this community more invisible and politically marginal than other 36 ethnic groups with a longer history of migration and colonial ties to the country. This 37 contrasts with the 'privileged' position of Latin American migrants in Spain, based on 38 the strong historical links between the two. Also, the legal and institutional environment
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2 in which these organisations had developed, in one country and another, was different.¹³
3
4
5

6
7 Nevertheless, more recently some sectors of the Latin American community in 8
9 London had been working towards greater politicisation of community activities. Many 10
11 Latin American migrant organisations in London had their origins in the solidarity and 12
13 support groups set up by political refugees arriving in the seventies and eighties, mostly 14
15 from Chile and Argentina, but later also from Colombia. However, as in the case of 16
17 Spain, as the community grew larger and more diverse, these organisations began to 18
19 focus more on serving the local needs of migrants. These were the cases, for instance, of 20
21 Coras (Colombian Refugee Association), Carila (Latin American Welfare Group) and 22
23 IRMO:
24
25
26
27
28
29

30 IRMO used to be called Chile Democrático [Democratic Chile], but 31
32 following the downfall of Pinochet a lot of Chileans returned to their 33
34 country and the Chilean community was reduced to a small minority (...)
35
36 then, those who were in charge decided to restructure the group, created a 37
38 new constitution and opened up the organisation (...) which they renamed
39
40 IRMO, which stands for Indoamerican Refugee Migrant Organisation (...)
41
42 for the whole Latin American community (IRMO representative).
43
44
45
46
47
48

49 With time, some of the organisations had focused their attention on specific 50
51 groups, such as the elderly, the disabled, youth or women. But in general, their main 52
53 focus of work had become service provision for migrants at the local level, mainly in 54
55 the legal, social, economic and cultural areas, with issues of political participation being 56
57 less prominent. Their transnational connections were also weaker, with some exceptions
58
59
60

1
2 (mainly the work done in connection with the defense of human rights in Colombia).
3
4 Nevertheless, as the Latin American community became more established, issues of 5
6 long-term integration, including at the political level, were beginning to emerge. Two 7
8 examples of this were the recent establishment of a Latin American Workers'
9
10 Association, led by Colombian trade unionists, and the Latin Front (see Peró 2007).
11
12
13

14
15
16 One of the founders of the Latin Front was Gloria, the Colombian woman who 17
18 had run for local election in London and was also Aculco's representative there (see 19
20 above). Given her political background, this initiative was from the beginning a more 21
22 political one, aimed primarily at the legal and political recognition of Latin Americans 23
24 in the United Kingdom as an 'ethnic' group. The Latin Front campaigned for an amnesty
25
26 for irregular migrants, greater political rights for the migrant population (including 27
28 voting), and the automatic granting of British citizenship to all children born in the 29
30 country (interview with Gloria). As well as lobbying the UK authorities, the Latin Front
31
32 had sought the cooperation of the countries of origin. More specifically, the Front
33
34 wanted Latin American countries to become more involved in defending the rights of 35
36 their citizens abroad and provide alternatives for those who wanted to return. As such,
37
38 this new political initiative seemed to have been well received by the migrant 39
40 population, at least initially. According to Gloria, the Front had some 4,000 affiliated 41
42 members (mostly Colombian), and around twenty people working for it, twelve of them
43
44 dedicated to the political side, and others focused on social issues. However, in the little 45
46 time that had been operating, the Latin Front had also raised criticisms and scepticism, 47
48 with some migrants seeing it mainly as a personal project to gain local political power.
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58

59 As can be seen from the examples above, transnational and domestic political 60

1
2 activities at the collective level were stronger in the case of Spain than in the UK,
3
4 despite recent developments within the London community. These collective political 5
6 activities were led by those migrants with higher levels and histories of political 7
8 experience, as explored in the previous section. As in the case of individual 9
10 participation, the linkages between politics 'here' and 'there' were stronger in the case of 11
12 some organisations than others, with emphasis towards one place or another varying 13
14 according to context. In some cases, like that of Aesco or Aculco, this research found,
15
16 as Portes et al. (2008, p. 1083) did in their study of Latin American migrant 17
18 organisations in the United States, that 'the distinction between transnational and 19
20 domestically oriented organizations' can sometimes be 'overstated'.
21
22
23
24
25
26
27

28 Conclusions

29
30
31
32
33 This article has sought to contribute to current debates on migrants and minorities'
34
35 political mobilisation in the European context, from a transnational approach. That 36
37 relatively new theoretical approach to the study of international migration allows us to 38
39 bring to the fore forms of migrant mobilisation previously obscured, and to highlight the 40
41 connections between transnationalism and integration. In addition, the article focuses 42
43 attention on a new migrant collective, one that remains understudied despite its growing 44
45 significance, that of Colombians (and Latin Americans in general) in Europe, and more
46
47 specifically in Spain and the United Kingdom.
48
49
50
51
52
53

54 Despite the emphasis by other studies on the lack of political activism among 55
56 Colombian migrant communities abroad, the study on which this article is based found 57
58 widespread evidence of migrant political transnationalism among Colombians in the 59
60

1
2 two countries, notwithstanding the greater geographical distance, smaller numbers and 3
4 shorter history of migration of Colombians in Europe compared with their counterparts
5
6 in the United States.¹⁴ Even more interesting for the purposes of this special issue, the 7
8 research found evidence of many connections between migrants' political mobilisation
9
10 oriented towards the home country and activities related to host politics (and between 11
12 different migrant destinations). The cases analysed here show that these connections
13
14 happen both at the micro and meso levels. On the one hand, individual migrants
15
16 participated in the political life of both their countries of origin and destination, mainly 17
18 through voting and involvement in party politics (formal politics). On the other hand, 19
20 migrant organisations can also perform a political role vis-a-vis both (and other)
21
22 polities. These findings support evidence from US-based research indicating that there 23
24 is no contradiction between sustaining transnational ties and pursuing integration
25
26 (Portes and Rumbaut 2006; Portes et al. 2008). It is further argued that, rather than 27
28 seeing participation in home country politics as fostering or impeding political 29
30 integration of migrants in the host society, both types of political participation should be 31
32 seen within a continuum.
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41

42 The level, type and orientation of political participation can vary. The present
43
44 article has emphasised similarities and differences depending mainly on migrants'
45
46 country of settlement, previous political experience and specific contexts. Differences in 47
48 the historical development and size of the Colombian communities in the two countries
49
50 studied (also versus the United States), as well as in the structural and institutional
51
52 environments in each destination, are important. They have contributed to greater 53
54 opportunities for political mobilisation and the development of transnational links
55
56 among Colombians in Spain. However, personal characteristics, and especially previous 57
58
59
60

1
2 political experience, emerged also as crucial to explain political engagement. While that 3
4 might seem obvious it has not always been recognised or acknowledged, migrants often 5
6 erroneously being assumed to lack any worthwhile experiences prior to their migration
7
8
9 (for exceptions see Kotic 2007; Torres 2008).
10

11 12 13 Acknowledgements 14

15
16
17
18 This article is based on PhD research conducted at Queen Mary, University of London, 19
20 financed by the ESRC (PTA-030-2002-01565). I want to thank these institutions, the 21
22 migrants and others who participated in the study. Gratitude is also due to the two 23
24 anonymous referees, as well as Dr. Cathy McIlwaine and Prof. James Dunkerley, for 25
26 their useful comments on earlier drafts.
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

References

BASCH, LINDA, GLICK SCHILLER, NINA and SZANTON BLANC, CRISTINA
1994 Nations Unbound. Transnational Projects, Postcolonial Predicaments and Deterritorialized Nation States, London: Routledge.

BAUBÖCK, RAINER (ed.) 2006 Migration and Citizenship: Legal Status, Rights and Political Participation, Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press.

BERMUDEZ TORRES, ANASTASIA 2003 'Gender and Forced Migration: The Experiences of Colombian Refugees Living in London', MSc dissertation, Queen Mary, University of London.

BLOEMRAAD, IRENE 2005 'The Limits of de Tocqueville: How Government Facilitates Organisational Capacity in Newcomer Communities', Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, vol. 31, no. 5, pp. 865-87.

[COLOMBIA NOS UNE 04/06/08 'Los Colombianos en el Exterior'
\[http://www.minrelext.gov.co/wps/portal!/ut/p.cmd/cs/.ce/7_0_A/s/7_0_2PD/th/J_0_I
P/s.7_0_A/7_0_2MG/me/7_0_2MF-7_0_A/s.7_0_A/7_0_2PD\]](http://www.minrelext.gov.co/wps/portal!/ut/p.cmd/cs/.ce/7_0_A/s/7_0_2PD/th/J_0_I
P/s.7_0_A/7_0_2MG/me/7_0_2MF-7_0_A/s.7_0_A/7_0_2PD) (20/01/09).

FAIST, THOMAS 2000 The Volume and Dynamics of International Migration and Transnational Social Spaces, Oxford: Clarendon Press.

GAMLEN, ALAN 2006 'Diaspora Engagement Policies: What are They, and What

1 Kind of States Use Them?', Working Paper no. 32, COMPAS, University of Oxford.

2
3
4
5
6 GRILLO, RALPH 2001 'Transnational Migration and Multiculturalism in Europe', 7
8 Working Paper WPTC-01-08, Transnational Communities Programme, University of 9
10 Oxford.

11
12
13
14
15
16 GUARNIZO, LUIS EDUARDO 2006a 'Migración, Globalización y Sociedad: Teorías y
17
18 Tendencias en el siglo XX', in Gerardo Ardila (ed.) Colombia: Migraciones, 19
20 Transnacionalismo y Desplazamiento, Bogotá: CES, pp. 65-112.

21
22
23
24
25
26 ——— 2006b 'Las y los Colombianos Londinenses', Report prepared for the IOM.

27
28
29
30 GUARNIZO, LUIS EDUARDO and DIAZ, LUZ MARINA 1999 'Transnational 31
32 Migration: A View from Colombia', Ethnic and Racial Studies, vol. 22, no. 2, pp. 397-33
34 421.

35
36
37
38
39 GUARNIZO, LUIS EDUARDO, PORTES, ALEJANDRO and HALLER, WILLIAM 40
41 2003 'Assimilation and Transnationalism: Determinants of Transnational Political 42
43 Action Among Contemporary Migrants', American Journal of Sociology, vol. 108, no.
44
45 6, pp. 1211-48.

46
47
48
49
50
51 GUARNIZO, LUIS EDUARDO, SANCHEZ, ARTURO I. and ROACH, ELIZABETH
52
53 M. 1999 'Mistrust, Fragmented Solidarity, and Transnational Migration: Colombians in 54
55 New York City and Los Angeles', Ethnic and Racial Studies, vol. 22, no. 2, pp. 367-96.
56
57
58
59
60

1
2 HOME OFFICE 04/06/08 'Persons Granted British Citizenship United Kingdom, 2007'
3
4 [<http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/pdfs08/hosb0508.pdf>] (20/01/09).
5
6
7

8
9 INSTITUTO NACIONAL DE ESTADISTICA (INE) 31/05/08 'Revisión del Padrón
10
11 Municipal 2007' [<http://www.ine.es/jaxi/tabla.do>] (20/01/09).
12
13

14
15
16 IOM/UN (2003) Migración Colombiana en España, Ginebra: IOM.
17
18

19
20
21 ITZIGSOHN, JOSE, DORE CABRAL, CARLOS, HERNANDEZ MEDINA, ESTHER
22
23 and VAZQUEZ, OBED 1999 'Mapping Dominican Transnationalism: Narrow and 24
25 Broad Transnational Practices', Ethnic and Racial Studies, vol. 22, no. 2, pp. 316-39.
26
27

28
29
30 JONES-CORREA, MICHAEL 1998 Between Two Nations. The Political Predicament
31
32 of Latinos in New York City, Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press.
33
34

35
36
37 (2004) Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, vol. 30, no. 3.
38
39

40
41
42 (2005) Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, vol. 31, no. 5.
43
44

45
46
47 KOSIC, ANKICA 2007 'Motivation for Civic Participation of Immigrants: The Role of 48
49 Personal Resources, Social Identities, and Personal Traits', POLITIS-Working Paper no.
50
51 11, University of Oldenburg.
52
53

54
55
56 LANDOLT, PATRICIA and GOLDRING, LUIN 2006 'Activist Dialogues and the 57
58 Production of Refugee Political Transnationalism: Chileans, Colombians and Non-59
60

1
2 Migrant Civil Society in Canada', Segundo Coloquio Internacional Sobre Migración y
3
4 Desarrollo [<http://www.migracionydesarrollo.org/>] (26/10/07).
5
6
7

8
9 LEVITT, PEGGY and NYBERG-SØRENSEN, NINNA 2004 'The Transnational Turn
10 in Migration Studies', Global Migration Perspectives, no. 6, Geneva: Global 11 Commission on International Migration.
12
13
14

15
16
17
18 MARTINIELLO, MARCO and LAFLEUR, JEAN-MICHEL 2008 'Towards a 19 Transatlantic Dialogue in the Study of Immigrant Political Transnationalism', Ethnic 20 and Racial Studies, vol. 31, no. 4, pp. 645-63.
21
22
23
24

25
26
27
28 MCILWAINE, CATHY 2005 'Coping Practices Among Colombian Migrants in 29 London', Queen Mary, University of London.
30
31
32

33
34
35 ——— 2007 'Living in Latin London: How Latin American Migrants Survive in the 36 City', Queen Mary, University of London/Carila.
37
38
39

40
41
42 OECD (2007) 'International Migration Outlook 2007'
43 [http://www.oecd.org/document/25/0,3343,en_2649_33931_38797017_1_1_1_1,00.htm
44] (10/06/08).
45
46
47
48
49

50
51
52 OPEN CHANNELS 2000 The Colombian Community in London, Peterborough: Open
53 Channels.
54
55
56

57
58 ØSTERGAARD-NIELSEN, EVA 2003 'The Politics of Migrants' Transnational 59
60

1
2 Political Practices', International Migration Review, vol. 37, no. 3, pp. 760-86.

3
4
5
6
7 PELLEGRINO, ADELA 2004 'Migration from Latin America to Europe: Trends and 8 Policy Challenges', IOM Migration Research Series, no. 16.

9
10
11
12
13 PERO, DAVIDE 2007 'Anthropological Perspectives on Migrants' Political 14 Engagements', Working Paper no. 50, COMPAS, University of Oxford.

15
16
17
18
19
20
21 PORTES, ALEJANDRO and RUMBAT, RUBEN G 2006 Immigrant America. A
22 Portrait (3rd edition), Berkeley: University of California Press.

23
24
25
26
27
28 PORTES, ALEJANDRO, ESCOBAR, CRISTINA and ARANA, RENELINDA 2008
29 'Bridging the Gap: Transnational and Ethnic Organizations in the Political Incorporation
30 of Immigrants in the United States', Ethnic and Racial Studies, vol. 30, no. 6, pp. 1056-31 90.

32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39 ROGERS, ALI 2000 'A European Space for Transnationalism?', WPTC-2K-07, School
40 of Geography, University of Oxford.

41
42
43
44
45
46
47 SMITH, MICHAEL PETER and GUARNIZO, LUIS EDUARDO (eds) 1998
48 Transnationalism from Below, New Brunswick and London: Transaction Publishers.

49
50
51
52
53
54 (30/11/03) 'Diaspora', Semana
55
56 [<http://www.semana.com/opencms/Semana/articulo.html?id=75048>] (20/01/09).
57
58
59
60

1
2 TORRES, LEONORA 2008 'The Role of Latin Americanness for Immigrant Activism
3
4 in Europe. An Exploration of Qualitative Interviews with Latin American Leaders', 5
6 POLITIS-Working Paper no. 14, University of Oldenburg.
7
8
9

10
11 VERTOVEC, STEVEN 2004 'Trends and Impacts of Migrant Transnationalism', WP-12
13 04-03, COMPAS, University of Oxford.
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27

28 ANASTASIA BERMUDEZ is Visiting Research Fellow in the Department of 29
30 Geography, Queen Mary, University of London.
31

32
33 ADDRESS: Department of Geography, Queen Mary, University of London, Mile End
34
35 Road, London E1 4NS, UK. Email: platypus@telefonica.net
36
37
38
39
40

-
- 41 1 For a review of transnationalism and international migration see Vertovec 2004.
42
43 2 I looked at electoral participation, membership of political parties, general interest in political events,
44
45 participation in state or private initiatives linking the diaspora with the country of origin, as well as the 46
47 role played by community organisations, the ethnic media, religious institutions and human rights
48
49 organisations and networks.
50
51 3 According to official data, 96 per cent of Colombians living abroad concentrate in ten countries,
52
53 Venezuela, the United States, Spain, the United Kingdom, Italy, the Netherlands, Panama, Mexico
54
55 and Brazil (Guarnizo 2006a).
56
57 4 The information that follows is taken mainly from Guarnizo (2006b) and Open Channels (2000).
58
59 5 Although the sample was non-representative and biased towards those who were politically engaged, 60
I also interviewed Colombians with no or very little transnational political participation (7 in Spain, 6

- 1
2
3 in the United Kingdom).
- 4
- 5 6 In addition, Colombia has a bilateral agreement with Spain on dual nationality since 1980. The United 6
7 Kingdom, on the other hand, recognises dual citizenship.
- 8
- 9 7 Latin Americans can apply for nationality after two years of continuous residence, compared with five 10
11 years for refugees and ten years for nationals of other countries. Colombians were the largest group of 12
13 migrants acquiring Spanish nationality in 2005, with 7,334 (OECD 2007).
- 14
- 15 8 Spain is currently debating the possibility of granting the right to vote in local elections to migrants 16
17 from outside the European Union with an specific length of legal residence in the country. However,
18
19 at the moment, citizens from Colombia cannot vote in Spain or the United Kingdom.
- 20
- 21 9 All names used are pseudonyms, except in the cases of officials or leaders of organisations.
- 22
- 23 10 To apply for naturalisation as a British citizen, UK law asks for five years previous residence in the 24
25 country (or three years if the person is married to a British citizen).
- 26
- 27 11 Diaspora politics is 'usually about political disputes over sensitive issues such as national sovereignty 28
29 and security' (ibid, p. 762-63).
- 30
- 31 12 In its website, Aesco states that part of its mission is to "formulate and manage cooperation projects 32
33 that help improve the quality of life of emigrants and potential emigrants as well as their environment,
34
35 based on the principles of solidarity, co-development and human rights" (own translation)
36
37 [<http://www.aesco-ong.org/>] (20/01/09). See also Aculco's website [<http://www.aculco.org/>].
- 38
- 39 13 See Bloemraad (2005) on how states can foster, or presumably impede, the ability of migrants to 40
41 establish and sustain community organisations.
- 42
- 43 14 Although this is not always stated, these factors play a significant role when comparing the 44
45 transnational linkages of Latin American migrants in the United States and Europe, and is evidenced 46
47 in the lesser institutionalisation of transnational politics in the latter (less active presence of 48
49 Colombian political parties at election time, less penetration by Colombian diasporic initiatives, etc
50 51 ...).
- 52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60