

HAL
open science

Kapalikas

Judit Törzsök

► To cite this version:

Judit Törzsök. Kapalikas. Brill's Encyclopedia of Hinduism vol. III., Brill, pp.355-361, 2011. hal-00710898

HAL Id: hal-00710898

<https://hal.science/hal-00710898v1>

Submitted on 21 Jun 2012

HAL is a multi-disciplinary open access archive for the deposit and dissemination of scientific research documents, whether they are published or not. The documents may come from teaching and research institutions in France or abroad, or from public or private research centers.

L'archive ouverte pluridisciplinaire HAL, est destinée au dépôt et à la diffusion de documents scientifiques de niveau recherche, publiés ou non, émanant des établissements d'enseignement et de recherche français ou étrangers, des laboratoires publics ou privés.

Kāpālikas

Although no written works by Kāpālikas are known to us, this antinomian Śaiva movement of skull-bearers, who took up the attributes of Śiva's frightening form, Bhairava, was once very much present from Kashmir and Nepal to the Tamil-speaking South. The earliest mention of Kāpālikas is found perhaps in Hāla's Saṭṭasāi, datable in the 3rd to 5th centuries CE (Lorenzen, 1991, 13), but most of our sources on them come from the 7th to the 12th centuries CE. Since we have mainly indirect sources about their doctrine and practice, it is often difficult to separate fictitious or biased elements from what may be true in their descriptions.

Indeed, their very name is problematic. In its most general usage, the word kāpālika can simply denote someone who carries or deals with a skull or skulls (kapāla) on a regular basis. Thus, the word has been attested even in the sense of cremation-ground worker (Sanderson, 2009, 294).

Kāpālikas carried a skull with them according to all accounts, thus imitating Bhairava the Brahman-slayer. According to orthodox prescriptions, a Brahman-slayer had to expiate for his sin by living outside society for 12 years, carrying a skull as an alms bowl and a skull-topped staff. However, the Kāpālikas were not the only Śaivas who adopted this practice. So did the Lākulas or Kālamukhas, another Śaiva order of wandering ascetics whose scriptures have not survived. Furthermore, certain Śākta tantric practitioners also followed this as well as other practices of the Kāpālika ascetics, thus blurring the distinction between the original Kāpālikas and themselves.

Given these usages, one could distinguish between two religious meanings of Kāpālika. First, in a stricter sense, it denotes a particular Śaiva ascetic order, closely related to the Lākulas and the Pāśupatas. Second, in a wider meaning, it refers to a (usually Śākta) tantric practitioner who adopts the observance and possibly other practices of the original Kāpālikas.

The Lākulas

The direct precursors of Kāpālikas were the Lākulas, also called Kālamukhas and Mahāvratas (Sanderson, 2006). They were the first Śaiva sect to practice the mahāvratā (lit. great observance, also called kapālavratā or observance of the skull, lokātītavratā or observance going beyond the world and mahāpāśupatavratā or great Pāśupata observance), which required a full assimilation to Bhairava. In addition to carrying the skull-bowl, they wore a sacred thread made of human hair obtained from corpses, and they adorned themselves with ornaments mostly made of human bones: a necklace, earrings, bracelets or armbands and a hair jewel (śikhāmaṇi). The bone ornaments together with the sacred thread were called the five insignia (pañcamudrā), to which ashes were added as the sixth (Sanderson, 2005, 119). Ashes were used to cover the body, a practice that originated with the Pāśupatas. Lākulas were also to carry a skull-topped staff (khaṭvāṅga) and to meditate on Rudra, who was to be seen as all things, and whose highest manifestation was considered to be Dhruva.

The practice of the mahāvratā was preceded by Lākula initiation, after which the initiate was also required to understand and meditate on the cosmic hierarchy of 11 levels. These levels include and build on those taught by the Pāśupatas, and they are later extended upward and somewhat changed by agamic Śaivas. Lākula initiation involved, as a preliminary, the empowering of the disciple with the five brahmamantras (mantras associated with the five different forms of Śiva) of vedic origin, also employed by the Pāśupatas. From the few scattered references to initiation, it seems to have functioned similarly to agamic initiation: it started a procedure that was to be completed by further practice and that ultimately led to liberation. Unlike Pāśupata initiation, it comprised the purification of the cosmic hierarchy but did not yet include the fire rituals prescribed by the Āgamas (Sanderson, 2006, 189-194).

Thus, as far as it can be ascertained without any of their scriptures having survived, the Lākulas based part of their doctrinal and ritual system on that of the Pāśupatas, which they further developed. They recognized the Pāśupata scriptures and added to them their own: the Pramāṇas (Authorities), of which only the titles and a short citation are known to us. Their teachings concerning doctrine, ritual, and observances appear to represent a transition between the Pāśupatas and agamic Śaivas (Sanderson, 2006, 199-209).

Their name shows that they recognized Lakulīśa, an incarnation of Śiva, as their preceptor, just as the Pāśupatas did. One can but speculate as to why they adopted this name. It is possible that they claimed to be closer to the original teaching of Lakulīśa than the Pāśupatas themselves, who, according to their own accounts, received the doctrine through various disciples instructed by Lakulīśa.

One doctrinal point on which they clearly disagreed not only with the Pāśupatas but also with other Śaivas was the way in which assimilation (samatā / sāmya) to Śiva was perceived to arise at the time of liberation (mokṣa). According to a commonly reproduced account, whose earliest occurrence dates back to Sadyojyotis in the late 7th or early 8th century, Pāśupatas claimed to attain assimilation to Śiva through a transfer of his qualities (guṇasamkrānti), while Lākulas believed that Śiva's omniscience, without his omnipotence, was produced ex nihilo (utpatti) in the individual (Sanderson, 2006, 180-182, 192-199).

As it has been shown (Sanderson 2006, 182-184), the Kālamukhas or Kālāmukhas (lit. the black-faced) known mainly from South-Indian inscriptions between the 9th and the 13th centuries are identical with the Lākulas. They are said not only to cover themselves with ashes but also to eat them and to worship Rudra in a vessel filled with alcohol.

The Soma-Kāpālikas

Next to the Pāśupatas and the Lākulas, the Kāpālikas formed a third itinerant ascetic (vratin, as opposed to householders) current within Śaivism. While the word kāpālika can be ambiguous, these Kāpālikas had a more specific name that involved some form of the word soma (nectar/ambrosia/moon). Thus, Soma, Saumya or Somasiddhāntin (followers of the doctrine of Soma) were alternative names for nontantric or pretantric Kāpālikas; we find even the odd compound somajanakāpālī (Kāpālika of the Soma people) in the (unpublished) Kashmirian Jayadrathayāmala (3.35.33). The Soma-based names often replace the word kāpālika in parallel lists given in Tantras, Purāṇas and other sources which enumerate various Śaiva practitioners (māheśvaras).

An early agamic Śaiva scripture, the Sarvajñānottara (14.4), places promulgators of the Somasiddhānta in its cosmic hierarchy just above the Pāśupatas and the Lākulas (mahāvratas), at the level of Īśvara; the Pāśupatas reach only up to the level of plurality (māyā) and the Lākulas to knowledge (vidyā). Somasiddhāntins are commonly mentioned next to Lākulas in Śaiva tantric sources, as in the Jayadrathayāmala (1.45.83), which lists the Somasiddhānta observance next to the Kālamukha one, or in the (unpublished) Kaula Bhairavamāṅgalā, which lists the Somasiddhānta doctrine after the Lākula. Similarly, Kāpālikas and Lākulas are placed next to each other in Jayadrathayāmala 1.33.17; so are Kāpālikas and Kālamukhas in the Ṣaṭsāhasrasaṃhitā 3.75. D.N. Lorenzen (1991, 7-10) gives a tabulated list of the common classification of the four Śaiva sects, namely Pāśupata, Lākula, Kāpālika and agamic Śaiva, including further parallels in purāṇas and some other works.

These enumerations suggest not only that Kāpālika and Soma or Somasiddhāntin are synonyms, but also that these practitioners were closely related to the Lākulas, and, to a lesser extent, to the Pāśupatas. The close doctrinal association is confirmed by one of the most important surviving documents about Kāpālikas – a copper-plate inscription found in Malhar, Chhattisgarh, written around 650 CE (Bakker, 2000, 6). The relevant passage reads as follows:

Śiva has eight embodiments (mūrtyaṣṭau) [and eight] lords of divisions (vigraheśvara). The sixty-six Rudras are embodiments of Gahaneśa (“Lord of the Abyss”), they bestow liberation in a different form in each aeon. Now having reached the kali age, Śiva descended in this world as Lord Lakulīśa. He was born in the family of a Brahman called Somaśarman (“Whose Shelter Is the Moon”), was initiated by him into the mahāvratā, and became Jagadindu (“Moon-of-the-World”). He then initiated Musalisa. Then, in due course, the venerable Bhīmasoma, disciple of Tejasoma and grand-disciple of Rudrasoma, [was also initiated] according to the tradition started by Soma. (trans. by author)

The listed initiation names show that the text speaks of Somasiddhāntins. The two Kāpālikas of the Mattavilāsaprabasana or (Farce about the Antics of Drunkards), written in the early 7th century, are also called Satyasoma and Devasomā; thus -soma was most probably affixed to all initiation names. Such practice is not unparalleled, for several Śākta Tantras prescribe that all initiates must bear a name ending in śakti, irrespective of gender or caste.

The passage first mentions the eight embodiments (mūrti) of Śiva, then the eight vigraheśvaras or lords of divisions and finally Gahaneśa or the lord of the abyss as manifestations of the godhead. All these names are known from Śaiva scriptures, but they go back to the cosmic levels as described by the Lākulas (Sanderson, 2006, 200-201).

The eight embodiments (mūrtyaṣṭaka) are identical with the eight vidyeśvaras or Lords of Knowledge (e.g. Svacchandatantra 10.1161-1162): Ananta, Sūkṣma, Śivottama, Ekanetra, Ekarudra, Trinetra, Śrīkaṇṭha and Śikhāṇḍī. In the Lākulas’ system, they are placed just under the two highest forms of Śiva, who are Dhruva and Tejīśa, in the pure section of the universe. The next set of eight lords, the vigraheśvaras, is associated with the so-called eight divisions (vigraha), which represent the uppermost part of the Lākulas’ impure universe. Their names, which include four vedic ones, are known from the Mataṅgaṣāraṃeśvara (1.8.83-5): Śarva, Bhava, Ugra, Bhīma, Bhasman, Antaka, Dundubhi, and Śrīvatsa. Finally, Gahaneśa or the lord of the abyss is placed lower down in the impure universe but just above the 25 cosmic levels inherited from the Sāṃkhya, which represent the material world.

All these manifestations of Śiva appear at the borders of various divisions of the universe according to the Lākula system, which suggests that not only were the names borrowed from the Lākulas, but also that the cosmic divisions were taken over without any change.

The 66 Rudras mentioned, who are embodiments of the lord of the abyss, can be found in the Jayadrathayāmala (1.9.448-60) as the 66 Bhavas (Sanderson cited in Bakker 2000, 9-10). They are Śaiva gurus forming two groups. The first group of 28 Śivas starts with Śveta and ends with Someśa and Lakulīśa. They are said to bestow both exegesis of the scriptures and Śiva’s grace, that is, liberation through initiation, according to the pramāṇa system of knowledge, in other words, according to the Lākula system. They are also said to bestow, but only occasionally, Śiva’s grace immediately. The list of names mainly conforms to the list of manifestations found in many accounts of the Pāśupata system. The second group, comprising 38 Rudras, begins with Vareśvara and ends with Vaṣaṭkāra. They are authorized to bestow Śīva's immediate grace (sadyo'nugrahakartrtva), that is, they can give immediately liberating initiation; they also propound bhairavic teachings (bhairavāptappravaktārah).

By claiming these 66 Bhavas as their preceptors and manifestations of Śīva, the Kāpālikas achieved two things. First, they associated themselves with the Pāśupatas and Lākulas by recognizing their guru lineage and by claiming them their own too. Second, they extended the list with their own, longer lineage of gurus, whom they distinguished in two ways: (1) by attributing bhairavic teachings to them and (2) by claiming that they were the only ones to bestow immediate liberation (through initiation) on a regular basis. However, it is by no means certain that these tenets were really those of the Kāpālikas. As the inscription shows, the Kāpālikas recognized the existence of the additional 38 gurus, but the claim concerning initiation and bhairavic teachings could also belong to the Jayadrathayāmala's own version of the story.

Whatever the function of these Rudras was, the Somasiddhāntins clearly derived their teachings from Somaśarman. According to the inscription, it is Somaśarman who initiates Śīva's incarnation, Lakulīśa, into the mahāvratā. It is perhaps also Somaśarman who gives Lakulīśa an initiation name, Jagadindu (unless we interpret this as a mere epithet), of which the second half, indu, is a synonym of soma, the Moon.

Lakulīśa then initiates Mugalīśa. It is possible that this Mugalīśa is a Prakritic form of Mudgaleśa or Mudgalīśa, who may well be identical with Musaleśa of the little known Mausula sect (Bakker, 2000, 7). However, we need not suppose that he was a prominent transmitter for the Kāpālikas. The text also allows us to understand that Somaśarman himself or Lakulīśa transmitted the Soma tradition to the Mausulas as well as to the Kāpālikas separately, or that Musalīśa was just one of several gurus in the lineage with whom the Kāpālikas associated themselves.

This version of the descent of Lakulīśa shows, furthermore, signs of an appropriation of the Pāśupata-Lākula tradition and an attempt to demonstrate the superiority of the Soma-Kāpālika school. For Lakulīśa, who is also claimed to be at the origin of the Pāśupata tradition by the Pāśupatas themselves, is nowhere else said to be initiated into the mahāvratā; but in this Kāpālika version, he attains a fully legitimate status through his initiation into the mahāvratā. Since Somaśarman initiates him, he becomes not only a practitioner of the mahāvratā, but also a Kāpālika. The fact that Somaśarman is Lakulīśa's guru here makes the Kāpālika tradition date back further and appear more prestigious or original. The procedure of Lakulīśa's legitimation through Soma-Kāpālika initiation also implies that all those who recognized Lakulīśa as their founder, namely the Pāśupatas and the Lākulas, could be considered deviating Kāpālikas from the Kāpālikas' point of view.

Apart from the testimony of this inscription, a few additional details are also known about Kāpālikas, mainly from literary sources. From the Mattavilāsaprabasana we learn that Kāpālikas were to discard or distribute their possessions (saṃvibhāga) in the manner of other ascetic orders. They wore a loincloth (kaupīna) to cover themselves and kept only their bhairavic attributes, which included the skull-bowl and perhaps a snakeskin (abicaṃma, instead of Śīva's snake) for the brahmanical thread. Unlike other ascetic currents, Kāpālikas seem to have allowed women to receive full initiation: Devasomā appears to be a fully participating ritual companion to Satyasoma.

Kāpālikas seem to have had a strict rule to always speak the truth, satya (Hara, 1975, 259). This rule is reiterated in the above farce by the protagonist, himself called Satyasoma. An inscription of 1050, from Kolanupaka in Andhra Pradesh, which records a grant given by a Soma-Kāpālika called Somibhaṭṭāraka, also describes him as a “treasury of truth and ascetism” (satyataponidhi, Lorenzen, 1990, 233-4). This inscription confirms once again that they wore the five or six insignia together with the skull-bowl and the skull-staff. The list of attributes also includes three instruments, which were probably used during their rites: the hourglass-shaped ḍamaru drum, the mṛdaṅga drum, and the kābala, which is probably a large-sized drum. Somibhaṭṭāraka, who was the head (stbānādhīpati) of the local temple of Śaṅkareśvara, is said to have worshipped Śrīnātha.

Just as the Lākulas were to eat and drink anything without distinction (as did Pāśupatas in the latter part of their observance), so too did the Kāpālikas consume anything, including meat and leftovers. This as well as their cremation-ground attributes and rites implied that they were considered impure from the Brahmanical point of view. A Brahman who was touched by a Kāpālika had to take a ritual bath to purify himself, as attested, for instance, in Kalhaṇa’s Rājatarāṅgiṇī (3.369).

This being said, it is difficult to know exactly what impure rites were prescribed and performed by Kāpālikas. The description of Kāpālikas in literary works can be biased and stereotyped, conforming to poetic conventions (Hara, 1975, 259). It is also possible that some playwrights, particularly of later periods, when Soma-Kāpālikas were perhaps no longer part of the religious landscape, confuse Soma-Kāpālikas and certain tantric practitioners whose rites and doctrines are close to and perhaps based on those of the Soma-Kāpālikas. Here are a few practices attributed to Kāpālikas: they use and consume alcohol; they perform human sacrifices and offer human flesh, blood, marrow and the like to their deity; they meditate on the self as seated in the vulva (a possible reference to sexual rites); and they can obtain supernatural powers (siddhi) such as seeing the past, present and future, attracting or killing someone, and so on. Their supreme god is (Mahā)Bhairava and they worship terrifying goddesses such as Cāmuṇḍā. Kāpālikas are often said to roam around or frequent the mountain Śrīparvata, which is identical with today’s Srisailam in Andhra Pradesh, the site of the Mallikārjuna jyotirlinga (a particularly sacred linga said to be made of light, jyotis, and to be self-born; Bisschop, 2006, 201). According to the exegetical literature, Kāpālikas understood final liberation to be produced through possession (āveśa) by their supreme deity.

Kāpālika Practices in Early Tantras

Divine possession (āveśa), the practice of the mahāvratā, and cremation-ground imagery are also prominent features of certain pre-12th-century Śākta tantric texts, such as the (unpublished) Brahmayāmala or parts of the Jayadrathayāmala; therefore, they appear to be very close to what we can assume to be Kāpālika tenets. These texts are certainly not scriptures of the Soma-Kāpālikas, but they may have been heavily influenced by Soma-Kāpālika practices and were perhaps considered Kāpālika in a broader sense of the word (Dyczkowski, 1989, 29-31; Sanderson, 1988, 668-78). The boundaries between what was Soma-Kāpālika and tantric were often unclear: this is shown, for example, by the fact that Kṣīrasvāmin, commenting on Amara’s thesaurus (Amarakośa 2.7.25), takes kapālin to be a synonym of tāntrika, mahāvratin and somasiddhāntin (Handiqui, 1956, 640).

If the 66 Rudras of the Soma-Kāpālikas were indeed considered to have the role that the Jayadrathayāmala attributes to them, then the second set of 38 Rudras were conceived of by Kāpālikas as the mythical authors of Bhairavatantras. Another, much later source, Ānandarāyamakhin's Vidyāpariṇaya (a 17th-cent. drama), also attributes the Bhairavāgamas to Somasiddhāntins (Handiqui, 1956, 641). The association of Bhairavāgamas and Soma-Kāpālikas may stem from a confusion, but such a confusion could also reflect actual points of contact and the close relation of the Soma-Kāpālika with Bhairava-tantric systems. M.S.G. Dyczkowski (1989, 27-29) assumes that Kāpālikas had no scriptures or works of their own and looked to the Bhairavāgamas as their authority. Nevertheless, Kāpālikas are sometimes distinguished from followers of Bhairavatantras, as in the Kūrmapurāṇa (2.37.146), which lists Soma and Bhairava as two separate unorthodox (vedabāhya) currents.

A typical borderline case is the representation of Kāpālikas in Bhavabhūti's early 8th-century Mālatīmādhava. Although they do not bear names containing the element soma, they could well be Soma-Kāpālikas who are given satirical names after common Kāpālika attributes (Kapālakuṇḍalā or "She Who Has Earrings Made of Skulls" and Aghoraghaṇṭa or "He Who Has Aghora's [i.e. Śiva's] Bell"). At the same time, their rites and tenets conform quite closely to several prescriptions found in the Brahmayāmala (Hatley, 2007, 84-94), which is an early (6th to 8th century) Śākta text commonly listed among Bhairavatantras.

On the one hand, one can suppose that the term Kāpālika was used in a wider sense, possibly referring to practitioners of various cremation-ground rituals who followed Bhairavatantras and Śākta Tantras. On the other hand, looking at the Brahmayāmala for instance, one can presume that some of its rites may well derive from Soma-Kāpālika sources or practices. The following deities and rites could be borrowings or adaptations from the earlier Kāpālikas:

(1) Unlike in other Śākta tantras, the Brahmayāmala's two main deities involve kapālī or kāpālī in their names: the male is called Kapālīśabhairava, and his consort is Caṇḍā Kāpālīnī.

(2) The *mahāvra*ta figures prominently in some contexts. It must be performed as a preliminary to some cremation-ground practices (BrY. 46.2-3; 47.3; 48.10) and is described as the most powerful of the preliminary observances called vidyāvratas (BrY. 21.108-109). The text gives us the following definition of the mahāvratī's appearance:

[The practitioner] must cover his body with ashes and wear a crown of his twisted hair. The top of his head bears the crescent moon and is decorated with [a diadem of] skulls [incised on bone]. He wears jewels made of pieces of human bones in his ears, on his head, and on his arms. His sacred thread is made of human hair and a [similar?] girdle decorates his hips. He must put on a necklace and place a [bone ornament?] on his hair-tuft. His staff has a trident and a human skull on it, with decorations made of human hair. He should play the ḍamaru drum or a kettle-drum, o famous Goddess. He must also have a bell and put a garland of bells on his girdle. He should wear jingling jewels on his feet as well as on his hands and fingers. He has a heavenly armlet on the upper arm and must draw an eye on his forehead. He must emit a jackal's cry. (BrY. 21.102-107; trans. by author)

(3) Unlike in other Śākta tantras, divine possession (āveśa) in the Brahmayāmala is not said to be caused by a yoginī, a goddess or Śakti, but (mainly) by Bhairava. At the end of the above *mahāvra*ta, as a result of the practitioner's assimilation to Bhairava, the skull-bearing god appears and offers a boon. The practitioner (sādhaka) chooses to be possessed by Bhairava, who thus enters him through his mouth. Bhairava will be in his heart, while various groups of female deities will occupy different parts of his body. In this way, the practitioner is said to become Śiva in person.

Other passages describe possession by Bhairava in a similar way. Although possession is not the result of the mahāvratā, one must usually transform the body according to the mahāvratā beforehand (mahāvratatanuṣṭhita). Near the end of the passage cited below, it is also stated that the practitioner will thus possess all the qualities that Bhairava has (ye dharmā bhairave deve tair dharmaiḥ sa samanvitaḥ; BrY. 47.48). In this way, the text explicitly relates possession to the doctrinal question of how one attains Śiva-hood and Śiva's qualities.

The practitioner spoke: "Oh god, bearer of the trident, if you are satisfied with me, give me a boon. Accept me as your son, oh god, and may my sacrificial pavilion succeed."

[Bhairava replied:] "Well-done, great man, master of practitioners, great ascetic! Who other than you would merit to be my son, oh lord of men? Open your mouth, my child, I shall enter the interior of your heart. Thanks to this, you shall quickly become as strong and powerful as me."

Then the mantra-knowing practitioner must perform circumambulation clockwise and open his mouth. [The god] shall enter him, there is no doubt about that, and when he entered, [the performer of the ritual] will become Bhairava. The eminent practitioner shall fly up with his sacrificial pavilion, as the Lord himself... He shall take up any form at will... He will see whatever exists from [the level of] Śiva down to the Avīci hell with his own eyes. He shall be worshipped as Śiva. (Brahmayāmala 47.40-47; trans. by author)

(4) A cluster of chapters (46-48), the same ones that also prescribe the mahāvratā and promise possession by Bhairava, describe cremation-ground practices that could well come, at least partly, from the Soma-Kāpālikas. Each chapter involves a conversation with Bhairava and/or other deities or creatures. The first of these chapters (46) is called Mahāmanthāna (The Great Churning). The churning is performed in the cremation ground and preceded by a worship of nine skulls arranged on a maṇḍala and filled with blood, alcohol (madirā) and the mingled sexual fluids (picu). For the churning, which is carried out on top of a corpse, the practitioner must use materials obtained on the spot: the ad hoc pavilion he constructs is made of human bones, the vessel used is fashioned of clay he finds in the cremation ground, the churning stick is a large bone such as the tibia, and the rope is made of human hair and intestines taken from the dead. The rite mainly consists of acting out the cosmic churning of gods and demons in its cremation-ground version. Accordingly, it produces various miraculous objects, such as the Kaustubha gem (a gem suspended on the breast of Kṛṣṇa or Viṣṇu) or the moon, and makes groups of mythical beings and powers present, whose help may be refused if one aspires for greater powers or results. The practitioner in fact prepares his own Soma of impure substances in a vessel called sthālī, which he identifies with Aghorī, while the churning stick is to be identified with Bhairava and himself. Near the end of this rite, Bhairava appears with his goddesses, and they enter the practitioner. At the very end, Aghorī herself appears before him and accepts him as her son, giving her breast to feed him. After he drinks the nectar of immortality (which may be Aghorī's milk identified with the impure soma potion prepared, but this is not stated), he will be omniscient and identical with Bhairava himself. All the 70 million mantras shall also enter his heart. He will possess all the qualities that the supreme and transcendental (tattvātīta) Lord has.

(5) Various miscellaneous items could be added to this list, in particular the recurring use of substances obtained in the cremation ground, which could possibly indicate a common core of mortuary rites. Such rites include using the ashes of the cremated, not only to cover the body with, but also to draw a maṇḍala (Dyczkowski, 1989, 6), the offering of human flesh, and the use of the human skull as a substrate of worship (tūrayāga; Dyczkowski, 1989, 30). It is more questionable whether and which tantric sexual rites could possibly have Kāpālīka origins.

Bibliography

- Bakker, H., “Somaśarman, Somavaṃśa and Somasiddhānta. A Pāśupata tradition in seventh-century Dakṣiṇa Kosala. Studies in the Skandapurāṇa III.” in: Tsuchida, R. & A. Wezler, eds., Harānandalaharī. Volume in Honour of Professor Minoru Hara on his Seventieth Birthday. Reinbek, 2000, 1-19.
- Bisschop, P.C., Early Śaivism and the Skandapurāṇa. Sects and Centres. Groningen, 2006.
- Brahmayāmala*. Unpublished transcription and partial edition prepared by Hatley, Sh. & Cs. Kiss, based on MS n. 3-370 (palm-leaf) of the National Archives, Kathmandu. (Nepal-German Manuscript Preservation Project reel n. A 42-6.)
- Dyczkowski, M.S.G., The Canon of the Śaivāgama and the Kubjikā Tantras of the Western Kaula Tradition, New York, 1988, Delhi <sup>2</sup>1989.
- Handiqui, K.K., Naiṣadhacarita of Śrīharṣa, Poona, 1956.
- Hara, M., “Review of The Kāpālīkas and Kālāmukhas by D. Lorenzen” IJ, 27, 1975, 253-261.
- Hatley, Sh., “The Brahmayāmala and Early Śaiva Cult of Yoginīs,” diss., University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, 2007.
- Lorenzen, D.N., The Kāpālīkas and Kālāmukhas: Two Lost Śaivite Sects, Delhi, 1972, <sup>2</sup>1991.
- Lorenzen, D.N., “New Data on the Kāpālīkas,” in: Hildebeitel, A., ed. Criminal gods and demon devotees: essays on the guardians of popular Hinduism, Albany, 1989, New Delhi, <sup>2</sup>1990, 231-238.
- Sanderson, A., “Śaivism and the Tantric Traditions,” in: Sutherland, S. et al., eds., The World’s Religions, London, 1988, 660-704.
- Sanderson, A., “Commentary on the Opening Verses of the Tantrasāra of Abhinavagupta,” in: Das, S. & E. Fülrlinger, eds., Sāmarasya: Studies in Indian Arts, Philosophy and Interreligious Dialogue in Honour of Bettina Bäumer, New Delhi, 2005, 89-148.
- Sanderson, A., “The Lākulas: New Evidence of a System Intermediate between Pāñcārthika Pāśupatism and Āgamic Śaivism,” Indian Philosophical Annual 24, 2006, 143-217.
- Sanderson, A., “The Śaiva Age: The Rise and Dominance of Śaivism during the Early Medieval Period,” in: Sh. Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, Tokyo, 2009, 41-349.

JUDIT TÖRZSÖK